AMERICAN STATE PAPERS.

FOREIGN RELATIONS.

19TH CONGRESS.] No. 432. [1ST SESSION.

CLAIM OF R. W. MEADE ON THE SPANISH GOVERNMENT.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES APRIL 22, 1826.

Mr. FORSYTH, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, to whom was referred the petition of Richard W. Meade, reported:

That the petitioner was a claimant to a portion of the five million fund provided by the treaty of February 22, 1819, between the United States and Spain. That the Commissioners appointed to carry into effect the 11th article of that treaty rejected his claim on the last day of their session.

The committee consider that the decision of the Commissioners, forming a tribunal of limited and specified jurisdiction under a treaty, ought to be considered conclusive, and would recommend that the whole subject of claims of citizens of the United States on Spain prior to 1819 should be deemed settled; but the petitioner alleges that his claim has not been, and could not be, fairly examined by the Commissioners, for the want of sundry papers in the hands of the Spanish Government which they were bound to furnish; which were at his instance duly demanded, were not furnished prior to the day fixed by the treaty for the termination of the commission and the final decision on all claims presented to it; indeed, not yet furnished by the Government of Spain. The evidence laid before the committee shows that the Commissioners deemed the claim of Richard W. Meade embraced by the treaty; that at his instance a demand was made on Spain for the evidences deemed by them necessary to a fair examination of it; that this demand was not made on Spain, owing to unforeseen occurrences, until a short time previous to the termination of the commission, although the application for them by Meade had been made fourteen months prior to that time.

Under these circumstances, the committee believe that provision ought to be made for the petitioner; that he should not suffer by the delay to furnish evidence in the hands of Spain that we have demanded and they were bound to furnish. They therefore report a bill to give him the means of establishing his claim in the same manner as if the Board of Commissioners still existed.

As it is known to the committee that there are several other claimants in the same situation as the petitioner, they present a bill embracing all cases of a similar kind. They deem it, however, proper to state to the House that, as the five million fund provided by the treaty has been distributed among the claimants whose claims were allowed by the Commissioners, the amount now proposed to be paid will be in addition to that sum. In all cases where the delay to furnish evidence can be attributed to Spain there has been a violation on her part of the provisions of the treaty, for which she is, and should be, held answerable to the United States. The committee think that this question of liability and its extent should not be further touched until the facts are clearly ascertained and the money paid by the United States.

19TH CONGRESS.] No. 433. [1ST SESSION.

RELATIVE TO THE AMOUNT OF INDEMNITY TO SATISFY THE CLAIMS OF CITIZENS OF THE UNITED STATES ON SPAIN, UNDER TREATY OF FEBRUARY 22, 1819.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE MAY 10, 1826.

Mr. WHITE, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom were referred the memorials of certain underwriters and others, of Philadelphia and Baltimore, stating that the amount provided by treaty with Spain for indemnity to claimants against the Government of Spain was insufficient, and praying that the balance and interest be paid, &c., having had the same under consideration, reported:

That the memorialists represent, in substance, that sundry citizens of the United States, while engaged in lawful commerce, sustained losses by such acts as made the Spanish Government responsible for them. That the United States, by a treaty with Spain, dated the 22d day of February, 1819, renounced to Spain all those claims, and thus became liable themselves for the payment of the full amount of the principal and interest justly due upon them. That in and by the same treaty it was provided that a Board of Commissioners should be established, whose duty it should be to ascertain the amount and validity of said claims, and also a fund, not exceeding five millions of dollars, for their payment. That such Board was established and organized, who proceeded in the discharge of their duty, and ascertained that the principal alone, of valid claims, exceeded the sum aforesaid so much as to make it necessary that each claim should abate, at the rate of eight and one-third per centum, to reduce the amount which they might award to the sum specified in the treaty; that such abatement was accordingly made; and thus it has happened that, instead of receiving the full amount of principal and interest, to which the claimants were fairly entitled, no one of them has received one cent for interest, and each has been compelled to abate, at the rate of eight and one-third per centum of the principal due to him; and pray that provision may now be made for paying them, not only the principal, which they have been compelled to abate, but likewise interest upon the whole principal, from the time the injuries were sustained by them up to the time of payment, &c.

Your committee have attentively considered the matters embraced in and connected with the said memorials, and are of opinion that the United States are not bound, upon any principle whatever, to make any provision, in addition to that provided in the treaty, for the payment of either the principal or interest now claimed, and therefore recommend the adoption of the following resolution:

Resolved, That Congress ought not to appropriate any additional sum for the payment of either the principal or interest claimed by the memorialists.

(For the memorial on this subject, see antecedent No. 419.)

CLAIM OF WILLIAM HUNT, ADMINISTRATOR OF IRA ALLEN.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES MAY 16, 1826.

Mr. FORSYTH, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, to whom had been referred the petition of William Hunt, administrator of Ira Allen, deceased, reported:

The petitioner claims indemnity from the United States for injuries done to him in Great Britain by the unlawful seizure and detention of his property by British subjects. The ground of his claim on the United States is, that the exertions of Government have not procured him redress, and he therefore claims it out of the public Treasury. The committee cannot perceive on what principle the United States are expected to be answerable for the injustice of foreign Governments, foreign subjects, or foreign tribunals. Every citizen has a right to ask for, and should receive, the aid of his Government in the prosecution of his just demands on foreign powers; but this imposes no obligation of ultimate responsibility if that aid should be given in vain. The committee recommend the following resolution:

Resolved, That the claim of William Hunt, administrator of Ira Allen, be rejected.

CLAIM OF THE HEIRS OF CARON DE BEAUMARCHAIS.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES MAY 16, 1826.

Mr. FORSYTH, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, to whom was referred a resolution of the House to inquire into the expediency of authorizing the liquidation of the claim of the heirs of Caron de Beaumarchais in any future adjustment of the claims of citizens of the United States against the French Government, reported:

That the claim of Beaumarchais has been liquidated at the Treasury Department, but the balance demanded by him was not paid, because the officers of the Treasury were under the impression that it had been paid in France out of the funds given by France to the United States. On the application of the heirs of Beaumarchais, and in consequence of a correspondence with the French Government, the last three Presidents of the United States have, in succession, recommended an appropriation to pay the balance claimed under the former settlement at the Treasury. This appropriation has not been made, it is presumed, because Congress were not satisfied of the justice of the demand. On this difference of opinion between the Executive and the Legislature the committee deem it unnecessary to remark. The President has power to authorize, in any future adjustment of our claims on France, a stipulation for the pay ment of the claim of the heirs of Beaumarchais, or of any other person, whenever either justice to the party or the policy of the United States may require it; and it is not to be doubted that Congress would not refuse the appropriation to meet such stipulation if sanctioned by the Senate of the United States. But as no expression of opinion by the House can enlarge or diminish the power of the President to be obligatory on Congress hereafter, the committee do not deem it proper to do more than to bring to the notice of the House the general instructions given to Mr. Gallatin, while minister in France, which were communicated to the House by the President on the 2d of February, 1824, and published by its order. By these instructions Mr. Gallatin was expressly authorized to enter into the examination and adjustment of all claims of French subjects upon the United States.

Without ascertaining the fact, the committee take it for granted that the instructions to our present minister are not less extensive than those to his predecessor. The whole subject, in the judgment of the committee, stands where it ought to rest, unless Congress are of opinion that the claim ought to be at once paid. Believing that such an opinion is not entertained, they ask to be discharged from the further consideration of the resolution referred to them by the House.

RELATIVE TO NEGOTIATION WITH GREAT BRITAIN FOR THE ERECTION OF A LIGHT-HOUSE ON THE BAHAMA BANKS.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES MAY 19, 1826.

To the House of Representatives of the United States:

In compliance with a resolution of the House of the 16th instant, I transmit a report from the Secretary of State containing the information thereby requested.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

WASHINGTON, May 19, 1826.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, May 18, 1826.

The Secretary of State, in compliance with a resolution of the House of Representatives of the 16th instant, which has been referred to him, requesting information whether any arrangement has been made with the Government of Great Britain in consequence of the resolution of the same House of the 23d of December, 1823, recommending that a negotiation should be opened for the cession of certain keys on the Bahama Bank, has the honor to state to the President that, after the unsuccessful negotiation opened by Mr. Rush in relation to the proposed cession, information of which has been heretofore communicated to the House, instructions were transmitted to his successor to renew the negotiation, so far, at least, as to effect the object of causing the needful lights and other helps of navigation to be erected and provided; but no intelligence has been yet received at this Department of the renewal of the negotiation. That duty will be now confided to Mr. Gallatin, if, on his arrival in England, it remains to be performed.

Respectfully submitted.

SPOLIATIONS BY FRANCE ON THE COMMERCE OF THE UNITED STATES.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE MAY 20, 1826.

To the Senate of the United States:

In compliance with a resolution of the Senate of the 5th of March, 1824, requesting copies of the several instructions to the ministers of the United States to the Government of France, and of the correspondence between the said ministers and Government having reference to the spoliations committed by that power on the commerce of the United States anterior to the 30th of September, 1800, or so much thereof as can be communicated without prejudice to the public interest; also, how far, if at all, the claim of indemnity from the Government of France for the spoliations aforesaid was affected by the convention entered into between the United States and France on the said 30th of September, 1800, I transmit herewith a report from the Secretary of State, with the documents desired by the resolution.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

WASHINGTON, May 20, 1826.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, May 20, 1826.

The Secretary of State, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate of the 5th March, 1824, which was referred to this Department, requesting the President to "cause to be laid before the Senate copies of the several instructions to the ministers of the United States to the Government of France, and of the correspondence between the said ministers and Government having reference to the spoliations committed by that power on the commerce of the United States anterior to the 30th September, 1800, or so much thereof as can be communicated without prejudice to the public interest; also, how far, if at all, the claim of indemnity from the Government of France for the spoliations aforesaid was affected by the convention entered into between the United States and France on the said 30th September, 1800," has the honor to report to the President copies of so much of the instructions and correspondence in question as is supposed to be embraced in the call of the Senate; to which are added copies of other papers and documents to a great extent, which are believed to be within the intention, if not comprehended in the terms, of the resolution of the Senate. By a reference to former messages to Congress and to the public documents, the publication of which had been authorized from time to time by Government, it will be perceived that many of the papers now reported have been already communicated to Congress, or spread before the public through the medium of the press; but it has been thought, nevertheless, expedient to submit them in their present collected form, that a full and connected view might be presented at the same time. There may be even yet remaining in the archives of the Department others having a bearing on the subject which have escaped our diligence and researches.

My predecessor was unable to command, from the other important duties which he had to perform, sufficient time to have this collection completed during his continuance in office, after the passage of the resolution of the Senate. The same cause, not less sensibly felt by his successor, has delayed this report until the present period, and he feels himself required to state that, without material injury to the public service, he was himself unable to examine the many volumes containing the very extensive correspondence, from which the copies and extracts now submitted have been taken, or even attentively to peruse the whole of those copies and extracts which have been just finished. The desire to present them to the Senate, in conformity to the anxious wish of the claimants, before the close of its present session, renders these explanations necessary, and it is hoped that they may prove satisfactory.

The closing paragraph of the resolution of the Senate enjoins another duty, which, from the ambiguous manner in which it is expressed, the Secretary feels some difficulty in clearly comprehending. The Senate resolved "that the President of the United States be requested to cause to be laid before the Senate copies," &c., and concludes by requesting to cause also to be laid before the Senate "how far, if at all, the claim of indemnity from the Government of France for the spoliations aforesaid was affected by the convention entered into between the United States and France on the said 30th of September, 1800."

The Secretary can hardly suppose it to have been the intention of the resolution to require the expression of an argumentative opinion as to the degree of responsibility to the American sufferers from French spoliations, which the convention of 1800 extinguished, on the part of France, or devolved on the United States, the Senate itself being most competent to decide that question. Under this impression, he hopes that he will have sufficiently conformed to the purposes of the Senate by a brief statement, prepared in a hurried moment, of what he understands to be the question.

The second article of the convention of 1800 was in the following words: "The ministers plenipotentiary of the two parties not being able to agree at present respecting the treaty of alliance of 6th February, 1778, the treaty of amity and commerce of the same date, and the convention of 14th November, 1788, nor upon the indemnities mutually due or claimed, the parties will negotiate further on these subjects at a convenient time, and, until they may have agreed upon these points, the said treaties and convention shall have no operation, and the relations of the two countries shall be regulated as follows."

When that convention was laid before the Senate it gave its consent and advice that it should be ratified, provided that the second article be expunged, and that the following article be added or inserted: "It is agreed that the present convention shall be in force for the term of eight years from the time of the exchange of the ratifications;" and it was accordingly so ratified by the President of the United States on the 18th day of February, 1801. On the 31st of July, of the same year, it was ratified by Bonaparte, First Consul of the French Republic, who incorporated in the instrument of his ratification the following clause, as a part of it: "The Government of the United States having added to its ratification that the convention should be in force for the space of eight years, and having omitted the second article, the Government of the French Republic consents to accept, ratify, and confirm the above convention, with the addition importing that the convention shall be in force for the space of eight years, and with the retrenchment of the second article: Provided, That by this retrenchment the two States renounce the respective pretensions which are the object of the said article.

The French ratification being thus conditional, was, nevertheless, exchanged against that of the United States, at Paris, on the same 31st of July. The President of the United States considering it necessary again to submit the convention in this state to the Senate, on the 19th day of December, 1801, it was resolved by the Senate that they considered the said convention as fully ratified, and returned it to the President for the usual promulgation. It was accordingly promulgated, and thereafter regarded as a valid and binding compact. The two contracting parties thus agreed, by the retrenchment of the second article, mutually to renounce the respective pretensions which were the object of that article. The pretensions of the United States, to which allusion is thus made, arose out of the spoliations, under color of French authority, in contravention to law and existing treaties. Those of France sprung from the treaty of alliance of the 6th February, 1778, the treaty of amity and commerce of the same date, and the convention of the 14th of November, 1788. Whatever obligations or indemnities from those sources either party had a right to demand were respectively waived and abandoned, and the consideration which induced one party to renounce his pretensions was that of the renunciation by the other party of his pretensions. What was the value of the obligations and indemnities so reciprocally renounced can only be matter of speculation. The amount of the indemnities due to citizens of the United States was very large, and, on the other hand, the obligation was great (to specify no other French pretensions) under which the United States were placed in the eleventh article of the treaty of alliance of 6th February, 1778, by which they were bound forever to guarantee, from that time, the then possessions of the crown of France in America, as well as those which it might acquire by the future treaty of peace with Great Britain; all these possessions having been, it is believed, conquered at, or not long after, the exchange of the ratifications of the convention of September, 1800, by the arms of Great Britain, from France.

The fifth article of the amendments to the Constitution provides: "Nor shall private property be taken for public use without just compensation." If the indemnities to which citizens of the United States were entitled for French spoliations prior to the 30th September, 1800, have been appropriated to absolve the United States from the fulfilment of an obligation which they had contracted, or from the payment of indemnities which they were bound to make to France, the Senate is most competent to determine how far such an appropriation is a public use of private property within the spirit of the Constitution, and whether equitable considerations do not require some compensation to be made to the claimants. The Senate is also best able to estimate the probability which existed of an ultimate recovery from France of the amount due for those indemnities if they had not been renounced; in making which estimate it will, no doubt, give just weight to the painful consideration that repeated and urgent appeals have been in vain made to the justice of France for satisfaction of flagrant wrongs committed upon property of other citizens of the United States subsequent to the period of 30th September, 1800.

All which is respectfully submitted.

Decree of the National Convention of the 19*th February*, 1793, second year of the French Republic, relative to produce exported and imported in American vessels to the colonies or to France.

[Translation.]

The National Convention, after having heard the report of the Committee of General Defence, decrees as follows:

ARTICLE I. That all the ports of the French colonies be open to vessels of the United States of America.

ARTICLE II. That all produce exported or imported in American vessels, on going out or entering in the colonies, or in France, pay the same duties as that borne by French vessels.

ARTICLE III. That the Executive Council be authorized to take proper measures that the States with whom the Republic is at war do not reap any benefit from the advantages granted to friendly powers.

ARTICLE IV. That the Executive power negotiate with the Congress of the United States to obtain, in favor of the French merchants, a like reduction of the duties granted by the present law to American merchants, and thereby more closely cement the benevolent ties which unite the two nations.

ARTICLE V. That the law of the 20th of August, 1790, be suspended, and that vessels laden with merchandise of the East Indies may be at liberty to land in any port of the Republic during the war; and that those which shall be laden with the productions of the Isle of France and of Bourbon shall henceforward enjoy the same privilege.

The National Convention has suspended the law of the 15th of May, 1791, which inhibited the Americans from introducing, selling, and arming their vessels in France, and from enjoying all the advantages allowed to those built in the ship yards of the Republic.

Certified to be conformable to the decree of the National Convention of France.

The Minister Plenipotentiary of the French Republic,

Copy of an address of Jean Bon Sant Andre to the National Convention of France, enclosed by Gouverneur Morris to the Secretary of State.

[Translation.]

Jean Bon Sant Andre, in the name of the Committee of Public Safety.

CITIZENS: If the report which I am instructed to make to the Convention in the name of its Committee of Public Safety had no other object than the particular affair to which it led, it might appear of a trifling nature; but legislators will doubtless observe in the passions which have provoked it, in the reproach of the laws, incoherent and contradictory, which have imposed on your religion in the diversity of opinion of two of your committee, that it was intrigue, supported by cupidity, to lead astray the wisdom of the representatives of the people.

The privateer Sans Culotte, of Honfleurs, captured on the 20th March, about six leagues from Portland, the American ship Laurens, Captain White, bound from Charleston to London with a cargo of rice and indigo. The Tribunal of Havre, Marat, pronounced the replevy of the vessel and cargo by its decision of April 10. It also condemned the captors to make the necessary repairs to the Laurens for enabling her to continue her route, to make restitution, under pain of 3,000 livres, to the crew, and to pay to the American captain the damages as well as the expense of the procedure.

Vile avarice with difficulty obtains its prey. Although the decision was just, as there did not then exist a law authorizing a French privateer to capture an American vessel, it was expected to obtain from the Convention a decree favorable to the pretensions of the owners. The proposition was not at first made openly, but intrigue, which is incessantly put in motion around us, which fabricates in darkness, which deceives even the most circumspect, the ideas of justice and equity, obtained that in the decree of May 9, rendered on the report of the Marine Committee, which authorizes the French privateers to seize on board of neutral vessels enemy provisions and merchandises. A retrospective effect should be given by the fifth article of that law. This was a surprise on your Marine Committee. Thus did the Minister of the United States think, who reclaimed strongly against this disposition, which he attributed to the suggestions of the owners of the privateer Sans Culotte.

The Committee of Public Safety, informed of the complaints of the Minister of the United States, demanded and obtained the report of the decree.

The second decree was again reported on the 28th of May. In fact, the Convention, to whom this question appeared delicate at that time, confined itself to order that the merchandises taken on board of neutrals should remain provisionally sequestered, and that the Committees of Public Safety and of Marine, in conjunction, should report to them on this business.

The Committee of Public Safety, pressed by the claims of the Minister of the United States, on the 1st of July made a report, on which the Convention decreed that, conformably to the treaty of February 6, 1778, the vessels of the United States should not be comprehended in the dispositions of the decree of the 9th May.

The affair relative to the taking of the Laurens seemed terminated by this decree. The owners of the Sans Culotte dared to hope for a new triumph, and, what is incredible, obtained it. The Committee of Marine, on the petition presented by them to the Convention, brought about the decree of the 27th of July, which maintained the dispositions of that of the 9th May.

However, a great and important question of policy was submitted to your wisdom by your Committee of Public Safety. Its object was to prepare the future glory of your commerce by determining to what point foreigners should be permitted to participate therein; the Committee of Public Safety proposed to you the act of navigation; you decreed, amidst the reiterated applause of an enlightened people, capable of appreciating the utility of the measures taken for their happiness. Now, in this navigation act you declared, in the name of the French nation, that you would fully maintain the commercial treaty concluded with the United States.

What doubt, therefore, can remain on this interminable affair? or shall we look for the expression of the true will of the Legislature in a decree which might have been the effect of surprise, or in one of those general laws, the fruit of the genius of the Legislature, made to descend to the latest posterity, and which, embracing in its dispositions all the views of policy, must have an authority equal to the force of the principles forming its basis, and to the happy effects which it should produce.

The Executive Council, obliged to pronounce between the French privateer and the American captain, seeing only the law and its principles, decreed the replevy of the ship Laurens, the payment of the articles of first necessity on board of her, and a just indemnification for the captain. The owners of the privateer complain most bitterly of this decision, and, adding insult to resentment, they accused the Executive Council of being bribed by Pitt. To imitate his Machiavelism; to commit injustice to neutral nations; to alienate Governments preserving friendship for us; and to prefer the fleeting interests of some individuals to that of the Republic in general, would seem to be under his influence.

But to have the courage of being just, even to its own detriment, and to consider much less its riches than its honor, is the character and the duty of a free nation which has founded virtue solely as the basis of its Government.

The Executive Council has but one thing to reproach itself with, that of having had a moment of weakness. Notwithstanding the evidence of the proofs resulting from the date of the departure of the ship Laurens from Charleston, the 7th of February, when she could not have had any knowledge of the rupture between France and England, of the interrogation of the crew, of the bill of lading, and especially of the correspondence of the party who loaded her; notwithstanding so many testimonies collectively concurring to attest the illegality of the capture, it consented to submit its decree to a revision.

A new examination has produced the same result. The Executive Council has been more and more convinced that the law of nations, which, in the principles of your policy, does not differ from justice, did not permit longer to detain a vessel which belongs to a neutral and friendly nation. Already have eight months elapsed since the taking of this vessel; several methods have been used to embroil an affair simple in itself; still renewed by all the concerned in the Sans Culotte, and still returning to the sanctuary of the laws. This is an asylum without doubt, but it is open but to innocence, to generous and disinterested patriotism, and not to vile cupidity and the egotist.

Your committee, who have traced this business, who have sifted it, do not deem it necessary to support demonstrative proofs by presumption; but they conceive they have discovered the true motives of that obstinate resistance which is opposed to the judgment of the tribunal, and to the acts of the Executive Council, and it is because they conceive they know them that they abstain from speaking of them.

How insinuating and adroit is the thirst for riches! how great is the art of violating the most sacred principles, in order to turn it to the establishment of principles themselves! They endeavor to draw your attention to the lot of the families of the marines interested in the prize. The captors say, in their petition, that those families would be reduced to misery if you decree the replevy of the Laurens. Legislators, you know the spirit which animates the marines; it is yours, it is that which pervades the whole French people, of which they form part. To injure the enemy of the country; to force them to respect it; to treat delicately its friends, rendering them affection for affection, benevolence for benevolence; this is what they wish. The sailors, when you shall have determined, will submit to your decision; they will rove on the sea and compensate themselves on the English for the justice you shall render to the Americans. It is not the interest of the sailor which the interested seek to save; this is trifling and inconsiderable; it is their own. It is their own fortune which influences their claim; they have just requested you to enrich themselves. Legislators, should you comply?

The following is the project which your Committee of Public Safety charge me to present to you:

"The National Convention, after having heard the report of its Committee of Public Safety on the petition presented to them by the owners and crew of the privateer the Sans Culotte, relative to the prize made by that privateer of the American ship Laurens, Captain White, and upon which the Tribunal of Havre, Marat, by its decision of the 10th of April, and the Executive Council by its arrêts of the 23d Frimaire, and of ——, have pronounced the replevy, decrees definitively that they have no occasion to deliberate thereon."

A member.—The affair in question has been sent to the Committee of Public Safety, Commerce, and of Marine, united. It occupied the latter several times; he does not think that national justice requires the restitution of the merchandises taken, and his motive is, that those merchandises are enemy property. In fact, several reasons lead to a belief that those merchandises are American; I say several, for there are also others which lead to doubt of their being so, and even demonstrate that they are English property fraudulently transported, as the deposition of one of the crew has led him to believe. Now, if it be true that these merchandises are enemy property, the national generosity cannot in any hypothesis authorize the restitution of them. There does, indeed, exist a treaty which stipulates that American vessels shall neutralize the merchandises which they carry; but this treaty is disastrous for the French Republic; and although the committee has not thought that it should propose to you to apply modifications herein, it supports itself by the decrees which you have hitherto enacted, and especially that of Brumaire, in which it is said that the treaties shall be supported, except where the revolutionary government shall be in the necessity of making modifications. Now, it is perhaps an indispensable modification to seek to impoverish the commerce of our enemies, daily enriching itself by the means of a disastrous treaty. The interest of Americans is not here in question; it is that of the English; for enemy merchandises, under whatever flag they may be transported, are still enemy property. I demand, therefore, that the project which is submitted to you be sent back to the discussion of the three committees; that the discussion be had immediately; and that the Committee of Public Safety be charged to examine the treaty of February, 1778, and to make a report on the question if it be not susceptible of the application of the decree of Brumaire.

Jean Bon St. Andre.—Two propositions are made to you—the one particular, the other general. I shall say nothing to you on the general proposition. It is for the Convention to examine whether it thinks the treaty of 1778 susceptible of modification. But as long as treaties exist, and you have besides recently contracted the obligation of executing them in an important and solemn act, I do not think that any consideration should lead you to deviate from the principles which you have adopted. The question being called for from all parts, the decree was adopted.

"We have (as Mr. Fenwick informs me) ninety-two sail of vessels at Bordeaux. I have formerly mentioned to you the embargo laid in that port. It has at length produced the greatest distress. The crews have consumed their provisions. The merchants will be saddled with heavy loss and cost. I have made reiterated applications, but the situation of that city has prevented the Comité de Salut Public from a direct interference. The commissaries have persisted in their measure of shutting the port. They promise Mr. Fenwick redress from day to day."

"I am promised daily that the embargo laid on our ships in the port of Bordeaux shall be taken off, and an indemnification be granted for the losses which it has occasioned. I have never been able to learn why it was laid, but have some reason to believe that just ground of suspicion had been given as to the voyages, the cargoes, and even the property, of some of the vessels then in that port.

"The deputation now here is pursuing the affair before the committees, and will, I trust, be successful, as it had already been resolved on to give adequate redress, and I presume that they will not impair the favorable intention which existed previous to their arrival."

Mr. Morris to the French Minister of Foreign Affairs.

[Translation.]

PARIS, February 27, 1794, 9th Ventose.

The Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States from America to the Republic of France to the Minister for Foreign Affairs.

SIR: The captains of the American vessels brought into your ports, and the interested in the said vessels and their cargoes, address to me very serious complaints which appear to me but too well founded.

I shall not here examine the measure in itself, excusable perhaps in the present extraordinary circumstances of the Republic. But admitting that even a hard necessity might justify the violation of the rights of a neutral and ally nation, should it be expected to experience only the inevitable vexations of that violation? It ought to expect that the French Republic would pay for these forced supplies with so much the more liberality and readiness, as the manner in which they have been acquired is rather uncommon. But I observe with regret that those who, sailing for France, have had the misfortune to be conducted to England, have had less to complain of than those who have been conducted into the ports of the Republic, in which delays and expenses consume the whole amount. Some of the American vessels have been re-captured, but the captains, guarded with a part of their crews on board the French vessel by whom they were taken, have not been informed of the re-capture until their arrival in a port of the Republic, where they have for months solicited damages, relief, the means of support, and permission to depart. I am sorry to add that all their solicitations have proved ineffectual. Captains Florence, Donavan, and Benjamin Rogers, taken into Brest by the Impetueux, Captain Bishop, are in this circumstance. Several American vessels and cargoes, among others that of the Danish vessel Kragerve, are in this same port, and I am informed that no person is there authorized on the part of the Republic to treat for the cargoes, to pay the freight of the vessels, or to fix the damages which the injured persons conceive themselves entitled to.

Thus the unfortunate, taken at sea by the vessels of an ally nation, and conducted prisoners into distant ports, are obliged, although without means and almost destitute of resources, to undertake a long and expensive voyage, in order to obtain that justice which, in fine, can be rendered only in the ports whence they sailed, as it is there that they must verify and arrange definitively the price according to the quality.

I hope, sir, that the most particular orders will be expedited to remedy these evils, and that you will speedily enable me to render a satisfactory account thereof to the American Government.

The Minister for Foreign Affairs to the Minister of the United States:

I have received your two letters of the 9th of this month, concerning different demands, the importance of which I am aware of. I have already submitted them to the Committee of Public Safety. I shall renew my solicitations to them, in order to obtain a decision as speedily as you desire.

If the committee have not yet determined on the claims of the American proprietors and captains, you must attribute the delay merely to the existing circumstances, and the multiplicity of business committed to them.

These captures create great confusion, must produce much damage to mercantile men, and are a source of endless and well founded complaint. Every post brings me piles of letters about it from all quarters, and I see no remedy. You have a copy of the minister's answer to my letter, holding out the hope of speedy decision, but it may be very long before it can be obtained. And in the meantime, if I would give way to the clamors of the injured parties, I ought to make demands very like a declaration of war. What am I to do in such cases? It is impossible for me to guess the intentions of Government, and indeed, sir, the responsibility is great and distressing."

Mr. Skipwith, Consul General of the United States at Paris, to Mr. Monroe, dated Paris, Vindemiaire, 3d year, (September 25, 1795.)

[Extract.]

"At your request I now lay before you a statement of the innumerable embarrassments and difficulties which our commerce has for a long time and continues still to labor under in the different ports of the French Republic. It is evident, if their Government does not soon remedy the incessant abuses and vexations practiced daily upon our merchants, vessels, captains, and crews, the trade of the United States with France must cease. I cannot give you an ample detail of all the inconveniences and oppressions which have been thrown upon our commerce—many of the consuls and their agents, to whom you have written to forward such documents to my office, having not yet done it; besides, it would take volumes to expose them at full length.

"From the communications, however, already received from the different ports, and from the information I have collected from the captains present, I can assure you that there are near 300 sail of American vessels now in the ports of France, all of whom have suffered, or are suffering, more or less delay and difficulties, of which the examples annexed will afford you a general view. The hardships of which I have chiefly to complain, and out of which there grows incalculable evils, may be developed under four general heads:

"1. The capture, indiscriminately, of our vessels at sea by the vessels-of-war of the Republic.

"2. The impossibility of Americans selling their cargoes and receiving payment at the ports to which they are conducted, or of their own accord arrive.

"3. The difficulties and procrastinations which they find in their transactions with the Boards of Marine and Commerce.

"4. The non-compliance or heretofore delay in fulfilling the contracts made by the agents of the French Republic in America for supplies of provisions.

"The seizure of our vessels at sea often gives rise to the most serious and well founded complaints; the stripping them of their officers and crews, who are generally replaced by boys and inexperienced hands, in order to be conducted to ports, exposes them to much injury, and sometimes total loss; the confinement of our sailors taken out of those vessels, the seals upon their cargoes, and, above all, the sending the papers to the Commission of Marine, at Paris, involves the most unwarrantable hardships and delays, and I am sorry to add that all our vessels experience some of those difficulties, even, indeed, such as arrive with cargoes on account of the Republic, months elapsing before the captains can get their clearances and papers, many of which are often lost or mislaid."

Mr. Redon, Commissioner of the Marine and of the Colonies of France, to Mr. Monroe, dated Paris, 7th Fructidor, 3d year of the Republic, (August 24, 1795.)

CITIZEN: The frankness which has always been and shall be the basis of the political and commercial transactions between the French Republic and that which you represent, commands me to awaken your solicitude upon occurrences which would tend insensibly to loosen the bonds which unite the two nations, if, as I cannot believe, you should not concur with the agents of the French Government in putting a stop to the multiplied abuses, of which the ports in the channel, and even the great ports of equipment, offer daily examples.

Some captains, furnished with American papers, frequent habitually those ports, and the shortness of the intervals which occur between their different trips give ground to strong suspicions against them. Most frequently they arrive in ballast, or with the semblance of a cargo, which they evade selling. Lately one arrived at Fecamp; contradicted himself in his declarations; in fine, every circumstance induces a belief that the real end, that the only end of the conduct they pursue, is a communication kept up between the French and English ports of the channel for the transportation of passengers, letters, and perhaps even coin.

While I transmit you these details, I cannot avoid informing you of complaints of another kind, which have been made by French seamen returned from the English prisons, and who, destitute, in consequence of a tedious imprisonment, of all means of subsistence, have been obliged to pay these same captains from two to five guineas for a passage from Dover to Calais. Such conduct adds to the suspicion of an understanding with our enemies, the certainty of a base cupidity, which asks a ransom from patriotism, and speculates upon misfortune.

You must be sensible, citizen, that the character of neutrality, which renders a nation respectable, in our view, ought not to serve as an Ægis to private designs, nor to shut our eyes upon those measures which may commit the general welfare and safety of the Republic. It is therefore urgent that you should co-operate in unveiling the individuals who usurp the American colors in order to betray our mutual interests, and it is in the name of that friendship which unites two free nations that I now wish to induce you to secure the co-operation of men clothed with your confidence, in our ports, to prevent such monstrous abuses. Your well known character is a guarantee that you will second with alacrity the adoption of measures which, without wounding the sacred rights of hospitality, may frustrate the intrigues of individuals who, under the cloak of that title, and through the means of conformity of manners, habits, language, and customs, receive, with impunity, from the treasures of England, means of corruption a thousand times more dangerous to us than the chance of battles. I submit with confidence to your wisdom the means which would appear to me proper to attain this end.

You could, citizen, direct the consuls of the United States to invite every captain of an American vessel not to land either men or goods, when arriving in our ports, without first calling on the maritime agent to communicate to him the intention of his voyage, the nature and quantity of the merchandise on board his vessel, and their destination, where shipped, and the number of his passengers. Each captain might receive from you, or from the consular agents of your nation, the order to exhibit, upon demand, his journal and other sea papers.

From the nature of the facts I have laid before you, would you think, citizen, that there would be any inconvenience that the maritime agent, or an agent of administration by him delegated, should be authorized to go on board, in order to ascertain the faithfulness of the declarations, if they give room for well founded suspicions? And would you not say, in case their inaccuracy should be proved, that it would be proper to keep the crew and passengers on board until a decision from the Committee of Public Safety be had? You must be sensible that even in these cases, which I delight in believing would be very rare, I should, on my part, hasten to cause to be furnished every necessary succor and facility; and the indemnity, which might be due in case of the definitive admission of the vessels into our ports, would besides be settled.

At all events, you will no doubt deem it proper not to suffer the landing of the passengers calling themselves citizens of the United States until their title to that citizenship be legally ascertained by the consuls of your nation.

I beg you, citizen, to weigh these ideas, and to transmit me yours on the preventive means to be used, to avoid the repetition of the acts of which I have presented you a picture.

Extract from the Register of the Resolves of the French Executive Directory, dated 25*th Fructidor,* 4*th year of the Republic, (September* 11, 1796.)

The Executive Directory resolves as follows:

The Minister of Foreign Affairs will declare to Citizen Monroe, Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States of America, that if the Federal Government does not put a stop to the procedure against the Citizen Collot, and does not refer those who sue him before the Government and his natural judges in France, the Executive Directory will take the necessary measures that reprisals shall be used for reparation of all the injuries of the American Government, and of its agents, towards the French citizens and Government.

This resolve shall not be printed.

[Translation.]

The Executive Directory, considering that if it becomes the faith of the French nation to respect treaties or conventions which secure to the flags of some neutral or friendly powers commercial advantages, the result of which is to be common to the contracting powers, those same advantages, if they should turn to the benefit of our enemies, either through the weakness of our allies, or of neutrals, or through fear, through interested views, or through whatever motives, would, in fact, warrant the inexecution of the articles in which they were stipulated, decrees as follows:

All neutral or allied powers shall, without delay, be notified that the flag of the French Republic will treat neutral vessels, either as to confiscation, as to searches or capture, in the same manner as they shall suffer the English to treat them.

The Minister of Foreign Relations is charged with the execution of the present resolve, which shall not be printed.

CITIZEN MINISTER: I hastened to lay before the Executive Directory the copy of your letter of recall, and of the credentials of Mr. Pinckney, whom the President of the United States has appointed to succeed you as Minister Plenipotentiary of the said States, near the French Republic.

The Directory has charged me to notify you "that it will no longer recognize nor receive a Minister Plenipotentiary from the United States, until after a reparation of the grievances demanded of the American Government, and which the French Republic has a right to expect."

I beg you, Citizen Minister, to be persuaded that this determination, which is become necessary, does not oppose the continuance of the affection between the French Republic and the American people, which is grounded on former good offices and reciprocal interest; an affection which you have taken pleasure in cultivating by all the means in your power.

Accept, Citizen Minister, the assurance of my perfect consideration.

Answer of the President of the French Directory to Mr. Monroe's address on presenting his letter of recall; without date.

Mr. Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States of America:

By presenting this day to the Executive Directory your letters of recall, you offer a very strange spectacle to Europe.

France, rich in her freedom, surrounded by the train of her victories, and strong in the esteem of her allies, will not stoop to calculate the consequences of the condescension of the American Government to the wishes of its ancient tyrants. The French Republic expects, however, that the successors of Columbus, Raleigh, and Penn, always proud of their liberty, will never forget that they owe it to France. They will weigh, in their wisdom, the magnanimous friendship of the French people, with the crafty caresses of perfidious men, who meditate to bring them again under their former yoke. Assure the good people of America, Mr. Minister, that, like them, we adore liberty; that they will always possess our esteem, and find in the French people that republican generosity which knows how to grant peace, as well as to cause its sovereignty to be respected.

As for you, Mr. Minister Plenipotentiary, you have combatted for principles; you have known the true interests of your country—depart with our regret; we restore in you a representative to America, and we preserve the remembrance of the citizen whose personal qualities did honor to that title.

[Extract.]

"The Commissioners and special agents of the French Republic, in the West Indies, are destroying our commerce in the most wanton manner. They have issued orders for taking all American vessels bound to or from English ports—not those only which the English occupy in St. Domingo, but those of their own islands. They condemn without the formality of a trial. These orders appear, from the information I have received, to have been issued in consequence of letters from Mr. Adet, who, you will see in his note of November 15, said the French armed vessels were not merely to capture American vessels, but to practice vexations towards them; and who, I am further informed, wrote to the Commissioners that they could not treat the American vessels too badly. This state of things cannot continue long. It makes little difference whether our vessels go voluntarily to French ports, or are carried in as prizes. In the latter case, they condemn without ceremony; and, in the former, they forcibly take the cargoes, heretofore with promises of payment, which they generally broke; and now, I am told, without even deigning to give their faithless promises."

Secretary of State to Mr. C. C. Pinckney, Minister to France, dated Department of State, Philadelphia, February 11, 1797.

[Extract.]

"The spoliations on our commerce by French privateers are daily increasing in a manner to set every just principle at defiance. If their acts were simply the violation of our treaty with France, the injuries would be comparatively trifling; but their outrages extend to the capture of our vessels, merely because going to or from a British port; nay, more, they take them when going from a neutral to a French port. In truth, there is, in a multitude of cases, little difference whether our vessels are carried in as prizes, or go voluntarily to the French ports in the islands for the purposes of traffic; the public agents take the cargoes by force, and fix their own terms, giving promises of distant payment, which are seldom duly performed. With regard to the vessels carried in as prizes, the agents and tribunals of the French Government act in concert with the privateers. The captured are not admitted to defend their property before the tribunals, the proceedings are wholly ex parte. We can account for such conduct only on the principle of plunder; and were not the privateers acting under the protection of commissions from the French Government, they would be pronounced pirates. Britain has furnished no precedents of such abominable rapine. These proceedings are rapidly rendering the name of Frenchmen as detestable as once it was dear to Americans, and if suffered by their Government to be continued, a total alienation will be inevitable. The facts here alluded to have not all been subjects of formal communication to our Government, but they are publicly related in such manner as to leave no doubt of their existence. It will, therefore, be highly important to both countries, and the President earnestly desires you would endeavor to engage the attention of the French Government, (if those desires should not have been anticipated,) to put an end to such atrocities; otherwise, it will be involved with the immediate actors in one common fate of indelible infamy."

[Translation.]

CITIZEN MINISTER: The Consular Agent of the United States at the port of L'Orient, in his letter of Pluvoise, informs me that the owners of the privateer Hardy are prosecuting before the Tribunal of Commerce of the said Canton the condemnation of two American ships—the Hope and the Antelope—which these privateersmen manned under the pretext that their (rôles d'equipage) crew lists were not countersigned by a public officer of the United States, and that this formality was required by an ordonnance of the Marine of France. The same agent informs me that the said Tribunal of Commerce was to have written to you, and also to your colleagues, the Ministers of Marine and of Justice, to receive the instructions of Government in relation to the pretensions of the owners of the privateer. It is my duty, under these circumstances, Citizen Minister, for the interest of the commerce of my nation, to address to you some observations on this subject. I must then take the liberty of asserting that by no regulations of the United States are our ships subjected to this formality, and that not one of our vessels has (rôle d'equipage) a crew list thus countersigned. Moreover, in the different treaties and conventions that connect America with France, there is not found a single article sufficient to justify the doctrine set forth by the privateer. At the time when there existed a regulation of the former Government of France, that ordered the capture and condemnation of neutral ships whose rôles d'equipage shall not have been attested. This cannot, nor should it be understood but in relation to neutral ships belonging to powers bound, equally with France, by treaties containing contrary principles. I consider it unnecessary for me to communicate on this subject the right and supreme law of nations, being persuaded that you will think with me that every free and independent nation should possess the exclusive right to establish regulations for the management of their own navigation, and that no nation possesses the right to subject the citizens of another power to formalities to be observed in a foreign country not exacted by the laws of said country or by those to which said citizens belong. If, contrary to my expectation, Government establish the principle which the captain desires to see established, this would lead to the condemnation of all the ships belonging to my nation actually found in the different ports of France under the faith of treaties, and to authorize the cruisers of the Republic to capture all our merchantmen. Confidently relying on the justice and equity of the Ministers of Government, I am confident that the Tribunals of Commerce receive no instructions to favor such ungrounded pretensions.

Accept the assurance of my distinguished consideration.

FULWAR SKIPWITH.

No. 84.

French Minister of Foreign Affairs to the Consul General of the United States at Paris, dated 5th Ventose, 5th year, (February 23, 1797.)

[Translation.]

CITIZEN: I have received your letter of this month, relative to the American ships the Hope and the Antelope, the condemnation whereof is prosecuted by the owners of the privateer Hardy, before the Tribunal of Commerce sitting at L'Orient, because the rôles d'equipage (ships' rolls) were not countersigned by a public officer of the United States. You assert in your despatch, that by no regulation of the Federal Government are the ships of your nation subjected to this formality, and that none of your ships have rôles d'equipage, ships' rolls, so countersigned; again, you say, in the different treaties and conventions that unite America with France, there is not found a single article that can justify the doctrine asserted by the owners of the privateer Hardy. Your despatch, in this respect, contains an essential error. The Federal Government doubtless has never ceased to look upon the treaty of 1778 as obligatory upon the two nations. In this treaty we find the engagement reciprocally made, not to sail (when one of the contracting parties is engaged in war) without "sea letters (lettres de mêr) or passports expressing the name, property, and bulk of the ship, as also the name and place of the habitation of the master or commander of the said ships, that it may appear thereby that the ship really and truly belongs to the subject of one of the contracting parties, which passports shall be made out and granted according to the form annexed to the said treaty of 1778;" these are the very expressions of the 25th article of that treaty, whose object is to avoid and prevent all manner of dissensions and quarrels on one side and the other, the form of the passports (passports) and (letters) letters necessary to be given to vessels by the 25th article of the abovementioned treaty constitute an integral part of this treaty, and it becomes obligatory upon the two contracting parties, and it states that "leave and permission has been granted that the said ship has been visited before sailing, that the master or commander of the ship shall make oath before the officers of marine that the said ship belongs to one or more of the subjects of ————, the act whereof shall be put at the end of these presents, as likewise that he will keep, and cause to be kept by his crew on board, the marine ordinances and regulations, and enter in the proper office a list, signed and witnessed, containing the names and surnames, the places of birth and abode of the crew of his ship, and of all who shall embark on board her; whom he shall not take on board without the knowledge and permission of the officers of the marine, and in every port or haven where he shall enter with his ship he shall show this present to the officers and judges of the marine." Such are the formalities stipulated in order to prevent the one of the contracting parties from permitting their flag to cover property belonging to an enemy of the other. Our regulation of the 26th of July, 1778, is but the result of the treaty of the 6th of February of the same year. It directs the condemnation of foreign ships that shall not have on board the rôle d'equipage, (ships' roll,) (arrêté,) made out by the public officers of the neutral countries where said vessel shall have set sail. I ought to add, citizen, that it is well known that all the commerce of England with the United States has been carried on, since the war, under American colors. We have no guarantee against this perfidious understanding, but in the execution of our treaty. The Tribunal of Commerce sitting at L'Orient will receive the decision of the Minister of Justice, charged with the direction of the tribunals.

The Executive Directory, by its arrêté of the 12th of the present month, has given the requisite orders for the entire execution of the treaties, conventions, and regulations, relative to the navigation of neutrals, and particularly of those with the Americans. I will transmit to you this arrêté as soon as I shall have received it officially.

Health and fraternity,

CH. DE LA CROIX.

Postscript to a letter from Mr. C. C. Pinckney, Minister of the United States to France, to the Secretary of State, dated March 23, 1797.

Since despatching the original and duplicate of No. 11, I have received information that the ship Charlotte, Captain John Vincent, has been captured and carried into Dunkirk. As she is a vessel bought in Europe, and consequently has no sea letter, and as the Tribunal of Commerce has referred the papers to the Minister of Justice, there can be no doubt but that sentence of condemnation will be pronounced as in Bryant's case. The French Consul at Carthagena, in Spain, has condemned the American Brig Atalante, of Yorktown, Virginia, Elathaco Minor master and owner; he has appealed to the Civil Tribunal of the Department of "Boriches de Rhone," at Aix, in Provence. But as his vessel is also in the same situation as Bryant's, we may expect a similar decision. A French privateer of St. Malo has captured and sent into "Isle de Bas," an American brig (whose name I have not yet learnt) from New York, bound to London, with a very valuable cargo of sugars, &c.; the pretences for capturing her have not yet been communicated to me; but as the French seem determined to distress our commerce as much as they can, pretences for condemnation are easily fabricated. I feel poignantly these continual violences offered to our trade and property, and that I am so situated that I cannot afford our countrymen the protection they ought to receive from our Government, nor show them that I even remonstrate against the power which oppresses them. To prevent hearing the firm representations which an American minister would have found himself obliged to present on account of these rapacious depredations, is one reason, I presume, that the Directory will not permit any one in that capacity to reside in France. Major Mountflorence advises me that he has convinced the head clerk of the office, whence the answer of the Minister of Foreign Affairs relative to the signature of the seamen's articles originated, that the Directory had given erroneous construction in respect to them to the treaty of 1778; and that the clerk had promised to prepare a report to the Minister, and prevail on him to present it to the Directory, to repeal the 4th article of the arrêté of the 12th of Ventose.

I much doubt if they will have the candor to acknowledge their error, for Mr. Adet's long recapitulation in his extravagant appeal to the people shows a determination in them to adhere to everything they have once advanced, although founded in error and palpable mistake. I wrote to Major Mountflorence to be careful in the petition he is preparing for the captains of the Hope and Antelope, to avoid any expression which might appear in the least disrespectful to either the Executive or Judiciary Departments of France. I have desired him to express our grievances firmly and decently, and to use no sentiments which might appear to have an intention to foment any division between the people and Government, or between one part of the Government and the other. We should disdain to pursue a conduct we disapprove in them.

Extract of a copy of a circular letter from the French Minister of Justice, of the 21st Ventose, (March 11,) to the Tribunals of Commerce.

"The arrêté of the Executive Directory, of the 12th of this month, is a guide pointing out, by a particular case, the course you ought to pursue in all others. The right of reciprocity, the legitimate and primitive basis of the law of nations, has made it indispensable, and the love of country should watch over its rigorous execution.

The first article also imposes upon me obligations which require the co-operation of your zeal and punctuality. I therefore invite you, citizens, in the name of the public good, to aid me in my efforts to comply with the views of the Executive Directory, and I venture to say those of all Europe, which will applaud the energy of an arrêté, the object of which is to re-establish the balance of commerce, and to destroy the overbearing preponderance of a perfidious and usurping Government. In vain have its agents deceived a people, to whose liberty we have given birth, unto the adoption of stipulations destructive of their and our interests; we know how to maintain an equilibrium by just and indispensable reprisals. The Executive Directory have established their principles according to the laws. It is your duty to make the application, and I confidently yield the care of them to that disinterested patriotism which has called you to the august functions with which you are charged.

No. 10.—Mr. C. C. Pinckney, Minister to France, to the Secretary of State, dated Amsterdam, March 18, 1797.

DEAR SIR: Since sending away the quadruplicate of No. 9, and a postscript to it of this date, I have received information that the French Directory have passed an article on the 12th Ventose, year 5th, declaring that, as by the treaty of the 6th February, 1778, between France and America, they mutually engage to grant no particular favor to other nations, in respect of commerce and navigation, which shall not immediately become common to the other party, who shall enjoy the same favor freely, if the concession was freely made, or on allowing the same compensation, if the concession was conditional; that, therefore, the articles stipulated in favor of England by the treaty concluded at London, on the 19th of November, 1794, between that power and the United States, are deemed to have been equally in favor of the French Republic, and of course to modify, in those points which are contrary to it, the treaty concluded the 6th February, 1778. That it was in consequence of these articles that the French Government had declared, by its arrêtés of the 14th and 28th of Messidor, year 4th, as it finds it constrained to do now, that it would use such means of reciprocity as it had a right to exercise in respect to what related to matters of war, as well as what regards the political, commercial, and maritime interests of the French Republic; that, consequently, it was necessary, "de fixes par le raprochment des traités du 6 Fevr., 1778, et du 19th November, 1794," every doubt on these points in which the rights of reciprocity ought to be exercised; and that, therefore, all merchandise which does not plainly appear to be neutral property taken on board of our ships shall be confiscated. That the articles of contraband shall extend to those mentioned in the 24th article of our treaty with Great Britain; and that every American bearing a commission given by the enemies of France, as well as every American sailor forming part of the crew of ships or vessels of an enemy, shall, by this fact alone, be deemed a pirate and treated as such, without being permitted in any case to allege that he hath been pressed by violence, menaces, or otherwise.

That, according to the law of 14th February, 1793, the regulations of the 21st October, 1744, and of 26th July, 1778, concerning the manner of ascertaining property of neutral ships and merchandises, shall be excluded according to their form and tenor. The decree, therefore, expressly states that every American vessel shall be, in consequence, good prize that shall not have on board a roll of the crew, such as is prescribed by the form annexed to the treaty of the 6th February, 1778, of which the execution is ordered by the 25th and 27th articles of the said treaty.

I will procure and forward the arrêté at length by the next opportunity. I am at present apprehensive that I shall be too late with this sketch for two vessels about sailing. The Hope and Antelope have been condemned because they had not the rôle d'équipage, or seamen's articles, signed by a public officer; which condemnation has proceeded on a mistaken exposition of facts, as nothing in the 25th or 27th articles, or in the form for sea letters annexed to the treaty, requires the signature of a public officer to such articles or rôle d'équipage. I will, by the next opportunity, also send the arguments of the Minister for Foreign Affairs for such condemnation, and the observations drawn by Major Mountflorence, and to be signed by Mr. Skipwith, and presented to the minister in answer thereto; also the report of the Minister of Justice to the Directory, and approved by that body, on the condemnation of Captain Bryant's vessel; it is impossible to copy them now, as I must close my letters.

I have the honor to be, with great respect and esteem, your most obedient, humble servant,

CHARLES COTESWORTH PINCKNEY.

"The depredations of the French in the West Indies are continued with increased outrage, and we have advices of captures and condemnations in Europe which apply to no principle heretofore known and acknowledged in the civilized world. You say that a late emigrant, now at Paris, has assured the French Government 'that America (meaning the United States) is not of greater consequence, nor ought to be treated with more respect, than Geneva or Genoa.' But is it possible that the Directory should credit his opinion? And must we be obliged to think that such an idea of our weakness regulates the conduct of the French towards this country? You know how ill-founded is the emigrant's opinion, and have the means of appreciating the motives which influence the Directory. You do not name the emigrant; we conjecture that you mean Talleyrand Perigord."

"I received accounts from Paris this ——— that no official answer had yet been given by the Minister of Foreign Relations to the reply drawn by Major Mountflorence, respecting the necessity of having the rôle d'équipage, or seamen's articles, signed by a public officer. That gentleman writes me word that he does not expect anything will soon be done in this business, for, in a conversation which he had with one of the officers of that Department, 'he acknowledged that they were puzzled how to answer it, and he did not know what measure to adopt; that it was, undoubtedly, the intention of the French Government to proceed against us with as much harshness and rigor as they could do consistent with their own construction of the treaties, but that the arrêté had gone too far, and that they did not know how to recede.' Although I cannot communicate, officially, with the Directory or its ministers, I will embrace measures to have them informed how strongly America feels and reprobates the hostile conduct of France in the capturing of our vessels; and that this conduct, and the improper behavior of Mr. Adet, has united all parties in America; and that if the present measures are persisted in, and our present grievances unredressed, that such an alienation in the sentiments of America will take place that the name and character of a Frenchman will be as much and as generally hated in our country as it was formerly greatly and affectionately esteemed. I have received information that they are in possession of your letter to me of the 26th December, as printed in an English paper; but the effect it has had upon them I am not yet informed of."

[Extract.]

"Although no official account has been published of the ignominious treatment you received from the French Government, yet the facts are pretty well understood, by various ways of intelligence, throughout the United States, and have excited a proper sensibility. These expressions are strengthened by the unexampled atrocities committed by the French agents and privateers in the West Indies, to say nothing of the flagrant depredations in the European seas, sanctioned by the Tribunals of France, and by her Consuls in the ports of Spain. I am satisfactorily informed that some of the latter are concerned in the privateers, with French commissions, equipped in the ports of Spain; and the report of Mr. Mountflorence, which you transmitted, shows that the merchants in the ports of France, who constitute the Tribunals of Commerce in which our captured vessels are tried, and on the most frivolous and shameful pretences condemned, are often, if not commonly, owners of the privateers on whose prizes they decide. The indignant reflections which such proceedings naturally excite need not be mentioned. Accounts of the French captures, piracies, and robberies in the West Indies would fill a volume. They are become so common as, while they increase the general resentment, excite no surprise. One of the most recent instances is that against the brigantine America, owned by Messrs. Norris & Hall, of Philadelphia, as stated and published in our newspapers by the master, Thomas Town, Jr. He sailed from St. Thomas's, a Danish island, on a voyage to Port de Paix, or Cape François, two ports in possession of the French, in St. Domingo. He arrived at Port de Paix with his cargo of dry goods and cash, the cash amounting to $16,919. A guard was immediately put on board his vessel, which was searched and the money found. They despatched him to Cape François, to the Commissioners, where it was decreed to take forcibly his cash and property. He refused to deliver his cash; they immediately ordered the guard to break the lock of his state room, and robbed him of the whole of it. And they forcibly took from his mate thirty-two half-joes, the proceeds of his adventure."

Letter of Captain Scott to the Consul General of the United States at Paris, dated Roscoff, April 9, 1797. (Enclosed to the Secretary of State, in Mr. Pinckney's letter of the 28*th April,* 1797.)

Sir: I wrote to you by last post, since which I am returned to Roscoff, and find the unloading of the brig John completed and her cargo stored in the town. I have been under the necessity of writing, this morning, to Mr. Diort to demand some assistance for myself and crew to subsist on until we know how we are to be disposed of, as all but myself are entirely destitute of every means, as what few things they saved they have nearly all sold to pay for their living since our condemnation, rather than be separated; but I found them yesterday, on my return, commencing their march for Brest, to be disposed of, I suppose, as English prisoners. I feel very anxious for the letter in answer to Mr. Diort, as our Government must surely make some provision for its citizens thus unwarrantably distressed and turned out of their employ to starve or go a privateering in a foreign country. In perusing the copy of my first letter, I am happy to find I was so minute and particular in relating my exact situation, as Mr. Diort informed me yesterday you had forwarded a copy of it on to Congress. The more I reflect upon my condemnation, sir, the more I am astonished. There must surely be some great flow [flaw] somewhere, or something very much misunderstood; it appears a piece of injustice, I hope almost unprecedented. America, surely, can have no idea of the risk her navigation is exposed to. This valuable cargo, sir, I had in charge must certainly be accounted and paid somewhere, as it is, I am confident, American property, and free from all deception. You will, I hope, excuse the freedom with which I write, as, from being at the fountain head of Government, you are no doubt best acquainted with the disposition of the two nations towards each other, and what, in this most difficult situation, is most proper to be done. But I think I see so much mischief and injustice depending and waiting our citizens, if they are thus to carry off the brig and cargo, that I shudder for the consequences that may ensue, as I am given to understand that expresses were immediately despatched to different ports, with instructions to masters of privateers, in consequence of my condemnation. The event is clear. In a little time the harbors of France will be full of American vessels, and, if Government appears to justify this judgment on me, in consequence of my ship's articles being agreeable to the laws of Congress, and like the American ships, full of prizes. But if there is a possibility of annulling, or even molifying, this most cruel decision, it will have a most happy effect in deterring these sea-plunderers from depredating on our commerce and navigation.

I am confident that you will exert yourself for our interest, (and God knows we, at present, need some powerful advocate and assistance,) and will, therefore, I hope, overlook my zeal if I have stated what perhaps you clearly foresee; and, as I before observed, you are best acquainted with what steps now to take, my motives arising from a wish not only to obtain, if possible, justice for myself and those concerned with me, but as well to save from similar distress, trouble, and perplexity, thousands of Americans, and to preserve the prosperity, if not the peace of our country.

Relying on your endeavors and best advice, I am, &c.,

JAMES SCOTT, Jr.

"I have removed to this place, for a short time, to see it and the Batavian Convention, but particularly to converse more fully and freely than epistolary correspondence would admit with Mr. Adams on the situation of our affairs relative to France. I am exceedingly sorry that my letters must continue to be filled with unpleasant details of the oppression which our countrymen and their property suffer from the unfriendly and tyrannic conduct (call it what you please) of that Republic with regard to us. The American sloop Charlotte, Captain John Vincent, mentioned in my postscript to the triplicate and quadruplicate to No. 11, has been condemned by the Tribunal of Commerce of Dunkirk upon the same principle as the condemnation in Bryant's case. An appeal has been brought by Mr. Coffyn, but in the present temper of France I have very little hopes of its success. The expense in this as well as in Bryant's case, I am informed, will be one hundred and fifty livres, besides the lawyer's fees and charges. The expense, however, is trivial in comparison with the object. The consular agent at Dieppe has notified the capture of the American ship Sally, Captain Davis, bound from Guernsey to Dieppe. The Tribunal of Commerce of Calais has condemned lately the American cutter Lark, Captain Davidson, belonging to Mr. Alexander Black, because the "rôle d'équipage," or seamen's articles, was not signed by a public officer. This vessel was not captured on her passage, but sailed voluntarily into Calais with passengers.

"The brig Leonard, of Newburyport, William Hasket master, from Norfolk, in Virginia, bound to Rotterdam, has been captured by the French privateer Lazare Hoche, and sent into Brest; an American brig, D., of New York, Andrew Foster master, bound from London to New York, has been captured by the French lugger Jean Barre, of St. Malo, Captain Le Compte, and sent into Morlaix; the John, of Boston, James Scott master, belonging to Messrs. Loring, Jonathan P. and John Hall, of Boston, has been captured also, and sent into the same port, by a schooner of St. Malo, having on her stern "The Star of Boston." In this enclosure I transmit you a copy of the condemnation of these two vessels, a copy of Captain Scott's letter to Mr. Diot, our Consular Agent at Morlaix; copies of Captain Scott's two letters to our Consul General at Paris, and Captain Foster's and Mr. Diot's letter to the same gentleman. They will evince the distressing consequence of the cruel arrêté of the 12th Ventose, and will bear honorable testimony to the humane and generous conduct of Mr. Diot, which I trust will be properly noticed by our Government."

"The Captain of the Vengeur, who, it is reported, is at New York, has attached the moneys due from the French Government to the citizens of America for his indemnification. The officers of the Treasury, though not about to pay, doubted whether an attachment would lie, but the Directory sent a mandate supporting the attachment. Major Mountflorence informs me the Tribunal of Commerce would not give him a day in court on the subject, and he is now obliged to apply to the Civil Tribunal of the Department. I likewise send you in this enclosure the circular letter of the Minister of Justice to the Tribunals of Commerce. It appears very much like urging the speedy condemnation of our ships, and is so understood. The following is a most curious paragraph, when we consider it as coming from the pen of the Minister of Justice.

"Speaking of Britain, he says: 'En vain ses agens ont ils surpris à un peuple, que nous avons enfanté à la liberté, des stipulations, contraires à ses vrais intérets, et aux notres, nous saurons maintenir l'equilibre par des justes reprisailles."

French Minister of Marine and of the Colonies to Citizen Boyerfonfrede.

[Translation.]

Copy 957.—LIBERTY, EQUALITY.

Bureau of Invalids, Paris, the 10th Floreal, year 5—(30th April, 1797.)

L. Prizes.

The Minister of the Marine and of the Colonies to Citizen Boyerfonfrede:

The solution of two questions upon the arrêté of 12th Ventose, (3d March.)

Citizen: I have examined the two questions which you proposed to me in your letter of the 7th ultimo. These questions are reduced to two: 1st. Are those American ships not having on board the ship's roll, (rôle d'équipage,) prescribed by the 9th article of the regulation of the 26th July, 1778, good prize? 2d. In this case are the ships only lawful prize? Upon the first question the Executive Directory has often given judgment, in the most formal manner, for the captors, particularly shown by its arrêté of the 12th Brumaire (3d November) last, approving a report made to it by the Minister of Justice relative to the capture of the Royal Captain, and this decision is in every respect conformable to the treaty of the 6th February, 1778, to which the Americans can and should refer. Indeed, the 25th and 27th articles of that treaty require all American vessels to have on board a (passeport or lettré de mêr) passport or sea letter, made out according to the form therein contained. In consulting this form, we discover that the captain is bound to remit to the officers of maritime affairs, at those ports where he shall land, a list, signed and witnessed, containing the names and surnames, the places of birth and abode of the crew. This list is nothing else but a rôle d'équipage. Every American ship must have a (passeport) passport and a (rôle d'équipage) ship's roll; I mean a (liste d'équipage) crew list.

Whereas, without these papers, she ought to be confiscated, because this (passeport) passport is the only paper on board admitted as a proof of the ownership of the vessel, and because the list exacted is the only paper which can afford sufficient proof that the crew are not composed of the subjects of an enemy's country, or of the proportion determined by the 9th article of regulation above cited.

The second question resolves itself into two very plain principles: the one, that every vessel which has on board neither (passeport) passport or (rôle d'équipage) ship's roll is considered an enemy; the other, that, by the terms of the 7th article, book 3, page 9, of the decree of 1681, goods the property of neutrals, and even of Frenchmen, found in an enemy's vessel, are good prize; so that no doubt remains that the cargo of every American vessel which shall not have on board either (passeport) passport or (liste d'équipage) crew list, in due form, is justly subject to confiscation. This opinion, as I have already said, is in conformity to that which has been decided by the Executive Directory, and the Minister of Justice is of the same opinion, whom I have particularly consulted on these two questions.

No. 96.

Mr. C. C. Pinckney to the Secretary of State, dated May 6, 1797.

"DEAR SIR: At length, after numberless vexations to our countrymen, and unjust seizures of their property, the French Government have explicitly avowed what they require of us. They now openly attack our national independence, and declare these seizures shall be continued unless we break a treaty sanctioned by the constituted authorities of our country. In a letter from Citizen Merlin, the Minister of Justice, to our Consul General at Paris, a copy of which I have this minute received, he says: 'As soon as your Government, restored to itself and to its true friends, and become just and reasonable, shall annul the extraordinary treaty it entered into on the 19th November, 1794, with our most implacable enemies, the French Republic will cease to avail itself of the dispositions of this treaty, so much in favor of England and so prejudicial to her; and I pledge myself that it will not be cited in order to support unjust pretensions.' In a postcript it appears that the Executive Directory authorized this letter; I herewith enclose you a copy of it. It is dated the fourth Floreal, (April 23, 1797,) but, from the date when the copy expedited to me, I believe it was not received by the Consul before the 27th or 28th of April. I have not seen a copy of the Consul's letter, which occasioned the answer of the Minister of Justice, except as it is quoted in the answer. I wrote to Major Mountflorence on the 10th of April, and mentioned to him 'that I conceived the 33d article of the treaty of 1786, between France and England, was only inserted pro majori cautelâ; and if it had not been there no right could have accrued to condemn vessels for the want of sea letters; that the article in our treaty justified the bringing such vessels into port for the purpose of examining whether the vessels were neutral or not, and not for the purpose of condemning them, if they were found to be really neutral; that we altogether denied that we had granted Great Britain any right or favor in that part of our treaty which relates to the capturing of enemy's or contraband goods on board of our vessels, for she was already in possession of that right, independent of the treaty, under the law of nations.' To you I need not make any comment on the minister's mode of reasoning in his letter. The ship Three Brothers, Captain Lendal Smith, of Portland, Massachusetts, was taken up the Straits by a French privateer, commanded by Captain Le Raix, of Marseilles, and sent into Malaga, where she is detained, and probably both vessel and cargo will be condemned; for this the French Consul assigns two reasons: one is the want of the rôle d'équipage, signed by a public officer; the other is the want of a bill of lading for the cargo, which consisted of staves, beef, flour, codfish, salmon, and plank, belonging to the captain and owner of the vessel."

[Extract.]

"I received accounts to-day that the Juliana, from Norfolk, in Virginia, is taken and carried into Havre; and that the Juno, Rainbow, and Charlotte, all three from Charleston, and the Hebe, from Savannah, are captured and carried into Nantez, and in all probability will be condemned for want of a 'rôle d'équipage.' certified by a public officer, agreeably to the regulation prescribed by France."

No. 98.

Letter from various masters of vessels condemned by France to Mr. C. C. Pinckney, dated Malaga, May 15, 1797.

SIR: The subscribers, citizens of the United States, after complimenting your excellency on your safe arrival at Paris, beg leave to represent to you our critical circumstances.

Every one of us are masters of vessels, the property of citizens of the United States, and we see, to our great concern, almost every day, some of our ships brought in and condemned by the French. These are condemned now upon a frivolous, but upon an unjustifiable principle. In peace, as well as in war, a vessel whose papers are not in proper order is liable to be condemned; but our case is quite contrary, for our ships are condemned because our papers are as they ought to be, according to the maritime laws of our country. The French Consuls, very unreasonably interfering with the maritime laws of the United States, pretend that our shipping papers should be certified by a public notary or some other officer in America, and their signature to be legalized by the French Consul resident there; this instance is unprecedented in all former wars. But, however wrong this their pretension may be, the more unjustifiable is it by their not giving our countrymen a warning for it, and a proportioned time, so that every owner and master of a vessel should have a chance of conforming themselves to this, though unreasonable and unprecedented, innovation. Be pleased to consider what a great number of American vessels, especially East Indiamen, that navigate the ocean unaware of all these proceedings, thinking themselves secure under the sanction of neutrality. What a ruin will fall upon our trade if, by not being provided with a formality they have no idea of, they should be taken. Even the Algerines, though barbarians, have given a proper time to ships of the United States to provide themselves with proper Mediterranean passports; why should not a civilized nation imitate their example? Our situation is still worse than that of an open war; for then every one would know what may happen to him, and would conduct himself in consequence. Even a man could endeavor to defend his property by force of arms, and in case of a reverse he would enjoy the benefit of a cartel. But now, if we should attempt to keep off by force a French privateer, although unjust and unwarrantable his depredations, it would be looked upon as a breach of neutrality. Therefore, tamely surrendering our vessels, under the good faith of neutrals, the ships are brought in, plundered, and condemned. What is still worse, the crew are turned on shore with only their clothes, and nothing else to keep them from starving, so that many of our best seamen are forced, through want, to enter on board those very privateers they have been taken by, and help them in plundering their own countrymen. In an open war a prisoner has a daily allowance from his enemy, and a cartel for returning him to his family; but in our present circumstances we can have but distant hopes of seeing home again. Please to measure, sir, these our circumstances by your feelings; and we earnestly beg you, sir, not to stifle or suppress those sentiments of philanthropy that will, undoubtedly, on this occasion, spring from your sensibility and patriotic heart in favor of your distressed countrymen; and be pleased then, following their dictates, to endeavor to bring about a speedy relief.

That your excellency may be successful in this circumstance, as well as in every other that will offer for the advantage and honor of the nation you so worthily represent, are the sanguine wishes of—

Your humble servants, the subscribers,

John Monroe, master of ship Lark, of Boston,
Increase Blake, master of schooner Laurel, of Boston.
Francis Elliot, master of brig Abbey, of Philadelphia.
Alexander Ross, jr., master of brig Greyhound, of Boston.
Lendal Smith, master of ship Three Brothers, of Portland—condemned.
Joseph Russell, master of ship Rebecca, of Haverhill.
Gideon Snow, master of brig Betsey, of Boston.
Peleg Tupper, master of schooner James, of Kingston.
Daniel Stone, master of schooner Rebecca, of Boston.
John B. Story, master of ——— Speedwell, of Boston.
Arthur Smith, master of brig Rover, of Baltimore.
Robert Mathews, master of brig Ninon, of New York.
Samuel Brooks, master of brig Mercury, of Boston—condemned.
Phil. Brum, master of brig Despatch, of Philadephia—condemned.
William Bradshaw, master of ship Polly, of Salem—condemned.
Ambrose Atkins, master of schooner Orrington, of ———, condemned.
Gilbert Stowland, master of brig Two Friends, of Boston—condemned.
Henry Lader, master of sloop Peggy, of Bristol, Mr. F. S.—condemned.
Thomas McIntire, master of brig Despatch, of Philadelphia.
John Monroe, in behalf of Captain William Billings, he being absent, and his ship, the Nancy, of Philadelphia, left under my care.

Mr. Montgomery, American Consul at Alicante, to Mr. Anjubault, French Consul at Carthagena, dated May 24, [1797;] (enclosed to the Secretary of State in a letter from Mr. C. C. Pinckney.)

SIR: I have received advice from Captain John Craft, of the Pomona, Captain William Plummer, of the Telemachus, Captain William Mayford, of the Eliza, and Captain James Alwood, of the schooner Abigal, belonging to citizens of the United States of America, that, on the 18th instant, in less than an hour after they got under way, in the bay of Alicante, they were boarded by the boats of three French privateers, two of which were then under Spanish colors, who forcibly put a number of armed men on board each vessel, and took the command from the above captains, steering a course for this harbor; and they arrived the day following, where, I further learn, they are detained by you for the examination of their papers.

As a time has elapsed more than sufficient for such purpose, they being in the best order, even agreeably to the decree of the French Convention respecting the rôle d'équipage, I am to request that you immediately deliver up the papers and discharge the vessels in question, that they may proceed on their intended voyages to America; and, in default of your complying therewith, I protest against you, in particular, for every damage that may possibly accrue from such irregular proceedings.

I flatter myself, however, that when you shall have duly considered this business, of a very serious nature, you will not oblige me to have recourse to our superiors, and will prevent the mischief that may arise from it.

I have the honor to be, sir, your most obedient,

ROBERT MONTGOMERY.

CARTHAGENA, 5th Prairial, An 5, (May 24, 1797.)

SIR: I have received your official letter dated the 24th of May. I do not believe, sir, that you possess authority to use, so near to me, such peremptory language, or to specify the time necessary for the examination of the papers of these four vessels. You can assert their being in the best order, even as to what regards the rôle d'équipage; you can require me to deliver them up immediately, and, upon my non-compliance, you can also protest against me, and make me responsible. I will not be deterred from deciding according to the laws which I am charged by the Executive Directory of my Republic to put in execution.

I greet you, sir,

ANJUBAULT.

Letter from certain masters of vessels, enclosed to the Secretary of State by Mr. Charles C. Pinckney, Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States, dated Malaga, May 24, 1797.

We, the late masters of ships sailing out of different ports of the State of Massachusetts, have had our vessels and cargoes condemned and extorted from us by the French Consul in this port, for no other reason than that of our shipping articles, or rôle d'équipage, not specifying the place of birth and residence of our crew, or being attested by a notary public before our departure from the continent.

These unprecedented and iniquitous proceedings have deprived us of all the property we were worth in the world; and was it not for the humane protection we have experienced from some merchants established here in the American trade, we should find ourselves under the necessity of begging for subsistence, and impossibilitated to return to our native country, which, however, is very uncertain yet, for five privateers, and fitted out of this port, are waiting for our departure to again bring us back, and probably rob us of our clothes and other necessaries, now our only property.

We have appealed from the illegal sentence to the Department des Bouches du Rhone, and charged Mr. Cathatan, our Consul at Marseilles, with the business, by forwarding him our power of attorney, copy of condemnation, and certificate from our Consul here of the crew being American citizens, and a demand against the French privateer and Republic.

We hope he will undertake our defence in a proper manner, &c.

Mr. C. C. Pinckney to the Secretary of State, dated the Hague, June 28, 1797.

[Extracts.]

"On the 20th instant Mr. Pastoret, in the Council of Five Hundred, referred to the article of the constitution which vests in the Legislature the right of declaring war on the requisition of the Directory. There exists (said he) a people to whom we are united by treaties, and yet whose particular situation, with regard to us, we are ignorant of. The Directory appears to treat the Americans as enemies, and yet the Legislature has not declared war against them. The arrêté of the 12th Ventose seems to suppose that, in violation of the treaty of 1778, the Americans had committed hostilities against us. The commissaries of the Directory in the colonies applaud themselves for having taken measures by which the French privateers had made a great number of American prizes. But what right had they to fit out privateers against the people? What law authorizes them to do so?

"It is true the treaty of 1794, concluded with England, our most inveterate enemy, excites well grounded suspicions with respect to the intentions of the Government of the United States. But this cannot be a sufficient reason for the Directory's violating, with respect to them, both the laws and constitution; besides, at that time we had no marine to assist in protecting their commerce, and our country was a prey to the most dreadful anarchy. He finished with moving, first, that the Directory be required to give an account of the actual political relations of France and the United States; secondly, that the arrêtés of the 12th Ventose and 17th Germinal, concerning the treaties with the American Government, should be referred to a commission to report on the question whether the Legislature can annul the arrêtés of the Directory. Both of these have been referred to a committee of five members, and the speech was ordered to be printed."

"Mr. Adet arrived at Havre in an American ship without a rôle d'équipage. I enclose you the remarks of the 'Courier Maritime du Havre' on this circumstance. He infers that Mr. Adet must have been convinced, with all other publicists, that a rôle d'équipage was not necessary, and that all that was requisite was the passport conformable to the model annexed to the treaty of 1778."

"It is not yet in my power to transmit you any favorable accounts of the result of Mr. Pastoret's motion. The committee, though composed of persons apparently very favorable to us, thought it prudent to postpone their report for some time, in order to give the Directory an opportunity of making, if they chose it, some previous observations; but the time they proposed to allow for the coming in of these observations has elapsed, and yet the report is not made. On the 9th instant Major Mountflorence had an interview with Mr. Pastoret, who seemed to wish that an application might be made to the Legislature by some of the masters or owners of our captured vessels, requesting the Legislature to enact a law to oblige the Tribunals, in their adjudications of American vessels, to make the treaty of 1778 the sole basis of their decisions."

"In answer to a claim made by Mr. Skipwith, under the consular convention, for the cargo of the American vessel, the Charlotte, shipwrecked, and which the Commissary of the Marine at Ostend had put into the hands of the Justice of the Peace at that port, Mr. De la Croix has written him word that he had desired the Minister of Marine to give the necessary orders for the entire execution of your consular, which directs, in such case, that the articles should be delivered to the Consul of the nation to whom the vessel belongs.

"This letter was written on the 8th of Messidor, (26th of June.) I have not yet heard what the Minister of Marine has done on this subject. On the 18th of Messidor, (the 6th of July,) Mr. De la Croix, in answer to an application made him by Mr. Skipwith, relative to the hardships our countrymen labor under in being detained at the seaports and frontier towns, without being admitted to go to Paris and into the interior of the country, writes him word that the Directory thought it just that those who were interested in captured vessels should be permitted to attend the trial, and that passports should be delivered for that purpose; but that, with regard to such Americans as had debts due to them from the French Government, their presence at Paris could be of no service to them; for the liquidation of these debts being subject to circumstances which they could not change, their application could not expedite the payment; and therefore the Directory had resolved to support the arrêté, which forbids the citizens of the United States to reside in Paris."

No. 105.

Secretary of State to Mr. C. C. Pinckney, dated Department of State, Trenton, October 24, 1797.

[Extract.]

"I enclose the duplicate of my letter to you of the 17th. On the 21th instant I received your letter of the 26th of July, No. 24, and beg leave to express to you the satisfaction I have received from the particular details of facts so diligently collected and communicated in this and your former letters, and the opinions and reflections accompanying them.

"The result of the transactions and events adverted to will, I hope, facilitate the success of your mission; and there ought not to be much embarrassment in the negotiation when our claims are those of simple justice. As much as we have been insulted and abused, the time, I trust, approaches when our wrongs will be acknowledged and redressed.

"The French nation will certainly not adopt the language of Merlin, and say of the people of the United States, 'que nous les avons enfanté à la liberté,' nor require, as a condition of the expected redress, that we should surrender our independence; for such would be the effect of a compliance with Merlin's demand, 'that we should break our inconceivable treaty with England.' We have never denied—on the contrary, every man in the United States has acknowledged—the important aid we derived from France. Nay, we have owned it with grateful hearts; and we should never have thought of investigating the foundation of this sentiment, if the incessant and boundless demands on our gratitude had not extended, in fact, to a surrender of the sole object for which aid was granted, and gratitude felt and expressed—our independence. This we never shall surrender but with our lives.

"The recall of Santhonax seems to have given some small relief to our West India commerce. The Commissioners at St. Domingo do not now condemn our vessels when bound to a French port, but only when bound to an English port. When they are bound to a French port, they content themselves with taking the cargoes for the administration; and thus, although the voyage is ruined, the merchants escape a total loss. What a consolation!"

Report of the French Minister of Justice, made to the Executive Directory, the 12th Brumaire, an 5me., (November 3, 1797,) of the French Republic.

[Translation.]

Citizen Directors: The ship Royal Captain, under the command of Captain John Bryant, was captured the 12th Thermidor last, about four or five hours' sail from France, by the privateer, the ——, of the port of Boulogne, commanded by Captain Oudart Formentin, and on the day following was brought into this port. John Bryant was not provided with the certificates and passports, or (lettres de mêr) sea letters, mentioned in the 25th article of the treaty of amity and commerce concluded between France and the United States of North America on the 6th of February, 1778. He had a rôle d'équipage, but either he refused to show it to Captain Formentin, or the Captain did not deem it of any value; and, indeed, several erasures were seen in it, two dates, &c., &c. These circumstances, surely, must have induced Captain Formentin to capture the ship Royal Captain, although John Bryant hoisted the American flag. On the very day of the capture Captain Formentin made a report before the Juge de Paix of Boulogne; and on the following day, and others up to the 26th, inclusive, it was preceded by the same officer in putting interrogatories to John Bryant and his crew, composed only of six men; in taking an inventory of everything on board the captured vessel; in affixing as well as breaking seals. No contraband or prohibited articles were found on examination, that is to say, such as are qualified to be so by the 26th article of the treaty of 6th of February, 1778.

As to the papers, if it does not appear from them that John Bryant was born in the United States of America, (on the contrary, they lead to the suspicion that he is a native of Ireland,) they prove, at least, that he is a citizen of the United States—he there took the oath of fidelity, and to support the American Constitution. On the 8th of August, 1793, he had the command of a schooner out of Portsmouth, in America, which is proven by the passport which had been delivered to him by the President of the Congress; and the Consul of the United States of America, residing in France, attests, in a certificate of the 28th Thermidor, that it is necessary that he be a citizen of the United States to have the command of any vessel whatever of his nation. Among these papers, there are some that prove, if they be entitled to credit, that John Bryant was master of the ship Royal Captain; that he was on board of and commanded her; that, subsequent to the commencement of hostilities between England and France, he purchased her in England of Joshua Johnson, American Consul at London, who had bought her of an English merchant; and that this American built vessel had formerly been captured by the British, and had become their property in virtue of a decree given at the island of Bermuda, which declared her a lawful prize. Finally, the bills of lading, forming a part of these papers, state that the merchandise on board this vessel had been bought by John Bryant, and consigned to Hepinque, and were destined for Bordeaux. A question has arisen between John Bryant and Citizens Jupet, Sons and Company, owners of the privateer Le Juret, to know if the ship the Royal Captain and her cargo ought to be declared a lawful prize, and as such confiscated to the benefit of the said owners.

The Tribunal of Commerce, of Boulogne, before which it was tried, decided in favor of complainant. John has sent in an appeal from its judgment. The Commissary of the Executive power near the Civil Tribunal, sitting at St. Omers, where this appeal is pending, has made me a report of it before he enters his opinion, in comformity with the 3d article of the law of the 8th Floreal last, and I ought myself, in consequence, to refer it to the Executive Directory.

In all matters of this nature one is placed between two ——, which interest and national honor equally require to be avoided. Care should be taken not to offend a friendly nation in the person of one of its members. The same fear should be had of favoring the commerce and measures of an ambitious and hostile nation. In adopting the laws which are common to the French and American people, there can be no danger incurred. The interest of France will be maintained, and the United States will have neither complaints nor claims to advance.

The 25th article of the treaty of amity and commerce concluded between France and the United States of North America on the 6th of February, 1778, says: "To the end that all manner of dissensions and quarrels may be avoided and prevented on one side and the other, it is agreed that, in case either of the parties hereto should be engaged in war, the ships and vessels belonging to the subjects or people of the other ally must be furnished with sea letters (lettres de mêr or passeports) expressing the name, property, and bulk of the ship, as also the name and place of habitation of the master or commander of the said ship, that it may appear thereby that the ship really and truly belongs to the subjects of one of the parties, which passport shall be made out and granted according to the form of this treaty," &c., &c.

N. B. The article is recited at length.

This article contains two stipulations. It was as first agreed when the ships and vessels of one of the parties should have (des lettres de mêr or passeports) sea letters or passports. Why was the convention entered into? This very article explains it, which is, to ascertain thereby that the same vessel is really and truly the property of the citizens of the other power. Whenever, then, ships or vessels are not provided with (des lettres de mêr or passeports) sea letters or passports, the nation at war cannot consider them as belonging to the subjects of the other. She must look upon them as forbans, pirates, or enemies. She can take possession of them, and they will be lawful prize. By the second, it is agreed that vessels that are laden must be provided not only with a passport, but also with certificates containing a minute description of the cargo, a declaration of contraband goods. The article also explains the motive of this second convention, to avoid and prevent all cause of suspicion, dissension, and quarrels on the one side as well as the cther; therefore, the captains and commanders of the ships belonging to a friendly power engaged in war shall be informed immediately of the character of the merchandise on board those vessels, if in whole or in part contraband and prohibited, if those ships, together with their cargoes, be subject to capture and confiscation, or if there be cause to remove from them a part of the contraband goods, in conformity with the 13th article of the same.

The ship Royal Captain, under consideration, was provided with neither (lettre de mêr) sea letter, passport, nor certificate. She was therefore suspected, and in France it cannot be admitted that she belonged either to the United States or the inhabitants or citizens of that country. It certainly was evident that John Bryant, the captain, was a citizen, and if what took place in England since the commencement of hostilities can be believed from an account on board, it will appear clearly that she is American built; that she was captured and condemned by the English at the island of Bermuda; that she was sold by an English merchant to the American Consul, resident at London, by whom she was again sold to John Bryant. Were the proof of these circumstances and facts otherwise unexceptionable, yet it could not, instead of the legal proof, afford the one required by the treaty of the 6th of February, 1778, the only one susceptible of admission. Too much indulgence in this respect, on the part of the French nation, would prove fatal to it; the commerce, frauds, and intrigues of its enemies would thereby be encouraged. This is not all: if we are to believe the assertion of John Bryant, that he was the owner of the Royal Captain; if, after the discovery of papers on board, we are to consider as a certainty that he acquired the ownership from the Consul of his nation, resident at London, it is also certain that this vessel belonged to the British, and that he purchased her after hostilities had begun between them and France; and by the terms of the 7th article of the regulation of the 26th of July, 1778, without speaking of those of the 23d of July, 1744, ships built by or formerly the property of an enemy are not to be considered as those of a neutral or ally, unless there be found on board authentic papers from under the hands of public officers competent to certify their date, or who can give sufficient proof that the sale and delivery thereof had been made to a subject of the allied or neutral powers before the commencement of hostilities.

The ship Royal Captain cannot, then, be looked upon as belonging to a neutral or ally, as John Bryant himself furnishes a proof that she had been British property, and was bought by him after the beginning of hostilities. She is therefore a lawful prize. John Bryant pretends that, relative to the liberty and safety of navigation and commerce, the treaty of February 6, 1778, is the only obligatory law for the ships of the United States; that all previous or subsequent edicts and regulations are foreign to them.

This pretension is true, with regard to conventions expressed in the treaty of February 6, 1778, but it is different with regard to the arrangements not therein expressed, and which are found in the edicts, and several regulations before and after this treaty, to render it admissible in this latter case. The treaty ought to have contained an express arrangement for this purpose. John Bryant does not admit that American vessels ought, of necessity, to be provided with (lettres de mêr or passeports) sea letters or passports; it is moreover certain, and acknowledged by the Consul General of the United States, resident in France, that the President of Congress is the only person who can give and sign them. But he says:

1st. That since the purchase of the Royal Captain he had never been in the United States, consequently he could not be provided with a (passeport) passport signed by the President of Congress; and

2d. That the (passeport) passport given to him by Citizen Coffyn, the American Consul General, resident at Dunkirk, was sufficient authority to sail under American colors. The answer to this presents itself; immediately after the purchase of the said vessel it was incumbent upon him to proceed to America to procure a (lettre de mêr or passeport) sea letter or passport; that from Citizen Coffyn would, perhaps, have been sufficient for his protection during the voyage, but entirely insufficient to authorize him to carry on trade, or it must be admitted that American Consuls have each, at his residence, the same power and the same rights as the President of Congress.

With regard to the (rôle d'équipage) crew list found on board the Royal Captain, it was observed to be irregular, that it had erasures, two dates, &c. John Bryant puts in a plea that, as the treaty of February 6, 1778, does not impose upon American vessels the necessity of having a (rôle d'équipage) crew list, the Consuls of that nation have alone the power to examine and censure these (rôles) lists. It is true that the treaty makes no mention of a (rôle d'équipage) crew list, but it was alluded to in the execution of the 25th article; it is said "that he to whom the passport is granted shall exhibit a list signed and confirmed by witnesses, containing the names, surnames, places of birth and habitation of those who compose the crew, and of all those who shall embark, whom he shall not receive on board without the knowledge and permission of the officers of marine."

Thus the argument of John Bryant fails in this circumstance. Citizens Directors, I think he ought to have replied to your Commissary of the Civil Tribunal of the pas des Calais; that he ought to approve of the decision of the Tribunal of Commerce of Boulogne, which declared the ship Royal Captain a lawful prize.

"You may, on every occasion, give assurances which cannot go beyond the real desires of this country to preserve a fair neutrality in the present war, on condition that the rights of neutral nations are respected in us as they have been settled in modern times, either by the express declarations of the powers of Europe, or their adoption of them on particular occasions."

No. 108.

Secretary of State to Mr. T. Pinckney, Minister to Great Britain, dated Philadelphia, May 7, 1793.

[Extract.]

"In one of your letters of March 13 you express your apprehensions that some of the belligerent powers may stop our vessels going with grain to the ports of their enemies, and ask instructions which may meet the question in various points of view, intending, however, in the meantime, to contend for the amplest freedom of neutral nations. Your intention in this is perfectly proper, and coincides with the ideas of our own Government, in the particular case you put, as in general cases. Such a stoppage to an unblockaded port would be so unequivocal an infringement of the neutral rights that we cannot conceive it will be attempted. With respect to our conduct, as a neutral nation, it is marked out in our treaties with France and Holland, two of the belligerent powers; and as the duties of neutrality require an equal conduct to both parties, we should, on that ground, act on the same principles towards Great Britain. We presume that this would be satisfactory to her, because of its equality, and because she, too, has sanctioned the same principles in her treaty with France. Even our 17th article with France, which must be disagreeable, as from its nature it is unequal, is adopted exactly by Great Britain in her 40th article with the same power, and would have laid her, in a like case, under the same unequal obligations against us. We wish, then, that it could be arranged with Great Britain that our treaties with France and Holland and that of France and Great Britain (which agree in what respects neutral nations) should form the line of conduct for us all, in the present war, in the cases for which they provide. Where they are silent, the general principles of the law of nations must give the rule. I mean the principles of that law as they have been liberalized in latter times by the refinement of manners and morals, and evidenced by the declarations, stipulations, and practice of every civilized nation. In our treaty with Prussia, indeed, we have gone ahead of other nations in doing away restraints on the commerce of peaceful nations by declaring that nothing shall be contraband; for, in truth, in the present improved state of the arts, when every country has such ample means of procuring arms within and without itself, the regulations of contraband answer no other end than to draw other nations into the war. However, as nations have not given sanction to this improvement, we claim it, at present, with Prussia alone."

No. 109.

Secretary of State to Mr. T. Pinckney, dated Philadelphia, June 14, 1793.

"I enclose you also several memorials and letters which have passed between the Executive and the ministers of France and England. These will develop to you the principles on which we are proceeding between the belligerent powers. The decisions, being founded in what is conceived to be rigorous justice, give dissatisfaction to both parties, and produce complaints from both; it is our duty, however, to persevere in them, and to meet the consequences. You will observe that Mr. Hammond proposes to refer to his Court the determination of the President, that the prizes taken by the Citoyen Genet could not be given up—the reasons for this are explained in the papers. Mr. Genet had stated that she was manned by French citizens; Mr. Hammond had not stated the contrary before the decision, neither produced any proofs. It was therefore supposed that she was manned principally by French citizens. After the decision Mr. Hammond denies the fact, but without producing any proof. I am really unable to say how it was, but I believe it to be certain that there were very few Americans.

"He says the issuing the commissions, &c., by Mr. Genet, within our territory, was an infringement of our sovereignty; therefore, the proceeds of it should be given up to Great Britain. The infringement was a matter between France and us; had we insisted on any penalty or forfeiture, by way of satisfaction to our insulted rights, it would have belonged to us, not to a third party. As between Great Britain and us, considering all the circumstances explained in the papers, we deemed we did enough to satisfy her. We are moreover assured that it is the standing usage of France, perhaps, too, of other nations, in all wars, to lodge blank commissions with all their foreign Consuls, to be given to every vessel of their nation, merchant or armed, without which a merchant vessel would be punished as a pirate were she to take the smallest thing of the enemy that should fall in her way. Indeed, the place of the delivery of a commission is immaterial, as it may be sent by letter to any one, so it may be delivered by hand to him anywhere; the place of signature by the sovereign is the material thing. Were that to be done in any other jurisdiction than his own, it might draw the validity of the act into question."

Secretary of State to Mr. Pinckney, dated Philadelphia, September 7, 1793.

[Extract.]

"We have received, through a channel which cannot be considered as authentic, the copy of a paper styled 'additional instructions to the commanders of his Majesty's ships-of-war and privateers,' &c., dated at St. James, June 8, 1793. If this paper be authentic, I have little doubt but that you will have taken measures to forward it to me. But as your communication of it may miscarry, and time in the meanwhile be lost, it has been thought better that it should be supposed authentic; that on that supposition I should notice to you its very exceptionable nature, and the necessity of obtaining explanations on the subject from the British Government; desiring at the same time that you will consider this letter as provisionally written only, and as if never written, in the event that the paper which is the occasion of it be not genuine.

"The first article of it permits all vessels laden wholly or in part with corn, flour, or meal, bound to any port in France, to be stopped and sent into any British port, to be purchased by that Government, or to be released only on the condition of security given by the master that he will proceed to dispose of his cargo in the ports of some country in amity with his Majesty.

"This article is so manifestly contrary to the law of nations, that nothing more would seem necessary than to observe that it is so. Reason and usage have established that when two nations go to war, those who choose to live in peace retain their natural right to pursue their agriculture, manufactures, and other ordinary vocations, to carry the produce of their industry for exchange to all nations, belligerent or neutral, as usual; to go and come freely without injury or molestation, and, in short, that the war among others shall be for them as if it did not exist. One restriction on their natural rights has been submitted to by nations of peace, that is to say, that of not furnishing to either party implements merely of war for the annoyance of the other, nor anything whatever to a place blockaded by its enemy. What these implements of war are has been so often agreed, and is so well understood, as to leave little question about them at this day. There does not exist, perhaps, a nation in our common hemisphere which has not made a particular enumeration of them in some or all of their treaties under the name of contraband. It suffices for the present occasion to say that corn, flour, and meal, are not of the class of contraband, and consequently remain articles of free commerce. A culture which, like that of the soil, gives employment to such a proportion of mankind, could never be suspended by the whole earth, or interrupted for them, whenever any two nations should think proper to go to war.

"The state of war then existing between Great Britain and France furnishes no legitimate right to either to interrupt the agriculture of the United States or the peaceable exchange of its produce with all nations; and, consequently, the assumption of it will be as lawful hereafter as now, in peace as in war. No ground, acknowledged by the common reason of mankind, authorizes this act now, and unacknowledged ground may be taken at any time and all times. We see, then, a practice begun to which no time, no circumstances prescribe any limits, and which strikes at the root of our agriculture—that branch of industry which gives food, clothing, and comfort to the great mass of the inhabitants of these States. If any nation whatever has a right to shut up to our produce all the ports of the earth except her own and those of her friends, she may shut up these also, and so confine us within our own limits. No nation can subscribe to such pretensions—no nation can agree, at the mere will or interest of another, to have its peaceable industry suspended, and its citizens reduced to idleness and want. The loss of our produce, if destined for foreign markets, or that loss which would result from an arbitrary restraint of our markets, is a tax too serious for us to acquiesce in. It is not enough for a nation to say, we and our friends will buy your produce. We have a right to answer that it suits us better to sell to their enemies as well as their friends. Our ships are not to go to France to return empty. They go to exchange the surplus of our produce, which we can spare, for surpluses of other kinds which they can spare and we want; which they can furnish on better terms and more to our mind than Great Britain or her friends. We have a right to judge for ourselves what market best suits us, and they have none to forbid to us the enjoyment of the necessaries and comforts which we may obtain from any other independent country.

"This act, too, tends directly to draw us from that state of peace in which we are wishing to remain. It is an essential character of neutrality to furnish no aids (not stipulated by treaty) to one party which we are not equally ready to furnish to the other. If we permit corn to be sent to Great Britain and her friends, we are equally bound to permit it to France. To restrain it would be a partiality which might lead to a war with France, and between restraining it ourselves and permitting her enemies to restrain it unrightfully is no difference. She would consider this as a mere pretext of which she would not be the dupe; and on what honorable ground could we otherwise explain it? Thus we should see ourselves plunged, by this unauthorized act of Great Britain, into a war with which we meddle not, and which we wish to avoid, if justice to all parties and from all parties will enable us to avoid it. In the case where we found ourselves obliged by treaty to withhold from the enemies of France the right of arming in our ports, we thought ourselves in justice bound to withhold the same right from France also, and we did it. Were we to withhold from her supplies of provisions, we should, in like manner, be bound to withhold them from her enemies also, and thus shut to ourselves all the ports of Europe where corn is in demand, or make ourselves parties in the war. This is a dilemma which Great Britain has no right to force upon us, and for which no pretext can be found in any part of our conduct. She may indeed feel the desire of starving an enemy nation, but she can have no right of doing it at our loss, nor of making us the instruments of it."

"SIR: In the letter which I had the honor of writing you on the 15th of May, in answer to your several memorials of the 8th of that month, I mentioned that the President reserved for further consideration a part of the one which related to the equipment of two privateers in the port of Charleston. The part alluded to was that wherein you express your confidence that the Executive Government of the United States would pursue measures for repressing such practices in future, and for restoring to their rightful owners any captures which such privateers might bring into the ports of the United States.

"The President, after a full investigation of this subject and the most mature consideration, has charged me to communicate to you that the first part of this application is found to be just, and that effectual measures are taken for preventing repetitions of the act therein complained of; but that the latter part, desiring restitution of the prizes, is understood to be inconsistent with the rules which govern such cases, and would, therefore, be unjustifiable towards the other party.

"The principal agents in this transaction were French citizens. Being within the United States at the moment a war broke out between their own and another country, they determined to go in its defence. They purchase, arm, and equip a vessel with their own money, man it themselves, receive a regular commission from their nation, depart out of the United States, and then commence hostilities by capturing a vessel. If, under these circumstances, the commission of the captors was valid, the property, according to the laws of war, was by the capture transferred to them, and it would be an aggression on their nation for the United States to rescue it from them, whether on the high seas or on coming into their ports. If the commission was not valid, and consequently the property not transferred by the laws of war to the captors, then the case would have been cognizable in our Courts of Admiralty, and the owners might have gone thither for redress. So that on neither supposition would the Executive be justifiable in interposing."

Circular letter from the Governor of Virginia to the Commandants of Counties in which are ports of navigation, dated Richmond, June 8, 1793.

SIR: The President of the United States having called on me, in my character of Commander-in-chief of the militia of this State, to be ready to suppress any attempt or attempts which may be made within the limits thereof to violate the neutrality he has declared in behalf of the people of the United States towards the belligerent powers, I consider it my duty to communicate the same to the commandants of the militia of those counties whose local situation may require it, together with the sentiments expressed by the President on this occasion.

He has declared that the treaty existing between the United States and France, and the treaty existing between the United States and Holland, do not authorize those powers to arm vessels within our ports; therefore any attempt on the part of the belligerent powers or their subjects so to do will be a violation of the neutrality.

In all such cases you will therefore be pleased to interpose with your militia, seizing and detaining any vessel which you may find within the limits of your county, commissioned, equipped, and manned as a privateer, on behalf of any of the belligerent powers or of their subjects; and you will also interpose in all acts of hostility which may happen between the belligerent powers, detaining the party first aggressing.

In any event of this sort, you will be so good, without loss of time, to communicate the case to me, with all the evidence, legally taken in writing, appertaining thereunto, that I may transmit the same to the President of the United States, whose decision, when known to me, will be forwarded to you.

Protest of Citizen Hauterive, Consul of the Republic of France, at New York, against the process and seizure of the Catharine, of Halifax.

Considering that tribunals are instituted to render justice between individuals, and not to judge of the differences that may arise between Governments, and still less to decide on the political relations which exist between nation and nation; that their sphere is circumscribed within the territorial limits of the State to which they belong; that there cannot be any relation of dependence between the tribunals which therein belong to two different nations:

That the consular jurisdiction is an extension and a first degree of jurisdiction of the Tribunals of Commerce and of Admiralty, instituted in foreign countries by the nation to which the political conventions have given the right of consulate as well as the right of recurring to the public force to insure the execution of the consular discussions:

That the limits of this jurisdiction depend only on the foreign Government which has established it, and that this Government may extend or contract it at pleasure, provided it does not attribute to it any action against the persons, the property, the police, and the local jurisdiction:

That in attributing to these tribunals dependent upon it that which belongs to another equally dependent upon it, a Government does not go beyond the limits of this power:

That recently the French Government hath given to the consulates of the Republic the jurisdiction of sea prizes, and has thus completely constituted them Courts of Admiralty:

That by that it only displaces one of the branches of the judiciary power; that the geographical position of a legally established tribunal neither alters the force, nor extent, nor independence of its jurisdiction:

That all intervention, direct or indirect, as to the French prizes being formally interdicted, the tribunals of the country, the admiralties of the two nations, however they may locally approach each other, are not the less separated from one another by the insurmountable barrier of political right:

That thus a French prize, remaining in a neutral port in virtue of treaties, is submitted to the consular admiralty in virtue of the right which nations have of organizing at pleasure their judicatures, is as much sheltered from the action of any other local tribunal as if it were in a French road:

For all these reasons, we, Alexander Hauterive, Consul of the Republic of France, considering that the New York District Court has extended its jurisdiction to a French prize, the decision of which was pending in our tribunal:

That this intervention, prescribed by the treaties, not only tends to establish a clashing of jurisdiction between two tribunals which cannot have communication together, but also to the annihilation of the consular tribunal, which is reduced to nothing as soon as the public force, which the treaties have given it the right of demanding to support its judgments, is employed against it:

That if this error of the judiciary power could be authorized by the Government, we must suppose that the Government has the right of interpreting, modifying, or destroying the political compacts which unite the two nations by the information and decision of the tribunals of one of these two nations:

We protest against the violation done to the rights of the nation we represent; we declare formally that whatever may be the decisions of the tribunal, which has arrogated to itself the judgment of the prize Catharine, of Halifax, to the injury of the consulate jurisdiction, the parties interested, who are amenable only to our tribunal, are not bound to conform to it; we declare this judgment to be null and of no effect whatever: 1st, by the notoriety of the incompetency of the tribunal; 2d, because it would be given in contempt of our protest; 3d, because it would be formed on insufficient information, the principal papers to elucidate the discussion being in our hands, never to go out of them; 4th, because the French Republic being one of the parties, it would be necessary, in order to proceed regularly, that the judges should find in the American laws that the French nation is amenable, in its political rights, to a private tribunal, and that they may be condemned by default.

We declare, in fine, that these rights shall remain entire, saving the requisition of damages and interest to the parties interested, and the demand of reparation for that of the two nations, who, in the diplomatic judgment, (the only competent arbiter between friendly nations,) will be acknowledged injured in its rights. Further, we declare that the judgment of the fact is still pending in the consular tribunal of the Republic at New York.

New York, June 21, 1793, 2d year of the French Republic. Certified to be conformable to the original.

Protest of the Consul of the Republic of France, at Philadelphia, against the seizure of the ship William.

JUNE 22, 1793.

Considering that no authority on earth has either the right or the power of interposing between the French nation and her enemies; that she alone is the arbiter and judge of the offensive acts which the support of her independence obliges her to commit against the despotic Governments coalesced to replunge her into a state of servitude, from which, abandoned by her friends, and assailed by so many enemies, she alone has been able to liberate herself; that the Court of Admiralty at Philadelphia, yielding at first to ill-founded reclamations, since recalling herself to the principles of the law of nations, has acknowledged its incompetency to the decision on the legality of French prizes:

That hence it evidently results that no local authority can take upon itself the information of a discussion which arises or may arise between nation and nation:

That nevertheless the Federal Government has placed a guard on the ship William, taken by the French galliot, the Citizen Genet, and by this matter of fact seems to declare that, previous to all discussion, it meant to interfere in the examination of the right and in the decision of the facts:

That if the Government interferes as local authority in the judgment of the facts, they deny and violate the principle expressly declared in the 17th article of the treaty between America and France:

That if, as a power invested by the nation to communicate with foreign Governments, they interfere in the examination of the right, they proceed previously by a method to this day unknown, in preceding a diplomatic discussion by an arbitrary and violent act, and by an execution purely military:

For all these reasons, we, Francis Dupont, Consul of the French Republic at Philadelphia, formally protest against the infringement committed on the rights of the French nation by the local government of Philadelphia.

We declare that, having proceeded in a judiciary manner to the sale of the said ship, and that being accountable, in the name of the French nation, to the purchasers of the property acquired by them, we throw upon the Government who has created these obstacles to acquiring the possession all the damages and interest.

We declare further that, in informing the minister of the French Republic of the violence opposed to the exercise of our functions, we, in his name, reserve, by the present protest, the pursuit in reparation for the violation of the conventional compacts and the outrage against the French nation in the ministry of its agents.

Done in our consulate, Philadelphia, June 22, 1793, 2d year of the French Republic.

SIR: Mr. Sedgwick, when last in this city, applied to me to release the vessel called the Republican, stating that she is the same upon the detention of which a Mr. Caritat has instituted an action against the Governor of New York and the federal marshal of that district, with a simul cum in his declaration involving the President of the United States and the Secretary of War. I told Mr. Sedgwick that the style of this proceeding precluded everything like an accommodation in the spirit of concession. He replied that nothing of this kind was wished, but that, on the other hand, Mr. Caritat had been misled, or something to that effect, but was now sensible that he could not do better than to regain his vessel. From the statement which was given me, I did not doubt that the Government would be ready to discharge her. But as we were not in possession of any accurate information as to her true situation, I desired Mr. Sedgwick to obtain it for me in New York. This has produced the enclosed letter from Mr. Fellows, who desires me to write to the marshal. Let me request you, sir, to transmit to me a memorandum of the case, and to add what you think the best mode of getting rid of the affair.

Report on a project of an act of navigation of the French Republic, presented to the National Convention, the 3d of July, 1793, in the name of the Committees of Marine, of Commerce, and of Public Safety, by Peter Marec, Deputy from Finistere; printed by order of the National Convention.

CITIZEN LEGISLATORS: You have referred to your diplomatic Committees of Marine and Commerce, united, the proposition made in your body the 20th of May last, to present to you, without delay, a project of an act of navigation.

This object, so worthy of the meditation of a republican legislator, has not been overlooked by your Committee of Public Safety. In the report they made to you on the 29th of May, on the state of the French Republic, they traced to you in general the invaluable advantages which would result to her from a measure which, having been adopted by England a century and a half ago, has been the most fruitful source of the prosperity of that rival power. But in a question of this nature, general considerations and observations, hastily made, are insufficient to impress conviction on every mind.

Your Marine Committee has been employed in collecting such ideas and elements as might completely enlighten you on the importance of a navigation act, and finally determine you to establish, at the side of the political constitution of the empire, this first basis of her commercial constitution. They could not unite, according to your views, with the Diplomatic Committee, which has not been renewed since the suppression of the Committee of General Defence, but they have concerted with those of Commerce and Public Safety, and it is in the name of these three committees that I come to present to you the result of their deliberations.

The principal end of the navigation act which we propose is, to destroy the interposition of all indirect navigation in the maritime transportation of our articles of exchange with foreign nations, and, in fine, to put a stop to that intermediate carrying trade, so prejudicial to our commerce and marine, which hitherto has rendered us benevolent tributaries of all the maritime powers of Europe. This act has also for its object to reserve to the national vessels the exclusive privilege of transporting the same articles of exchange from one port of the Republic to another.

This double prohibition is doubtless contrary to the principles of an indefinite commercial freedom; but such freedom, perhaps, would not agree with the system of an universal Republic; and it is conceived that the Republic of the human race will be still more difficult to realize than that of Plato. It is, then, our wisdom not to allow ourselves to be dazzled by the brilliant imaginations of political writers, and who warp the light of reason and experience in their spacious arguments and pompous theory. It is from the example of the great nations who surround us—from that nation, especially, who first knew how to apply to her navigation prohibitory regulations; it is from that source we ought to derive rules for our conduct, if we have at heart the true prosperity of our country.

France, taken in a commercial point of view, is the richest entrepôt of the universe; she is also the market which offers the most consumers and vent for the industry of other nations. Whence does it happen that, with so many resources and wants; with such abundance of territorial commodities, productions, and merchandises; with the habit of consuming such great quantities of the commodities, productions, and merchandises of foreigners, her navigation has hitherto been so languishing, her commercial marine so pitiful, so altogether destitute of the advantages which are its inherent right? Whence does it happen that the flag of her most formidable enemies has almost exclusively figured in her commercial relations? Because she was destitute of a navigation act; because a false, timid, and frivolous policy knew not how to produce, or did not dare to borrow from a great nation, proud of its wealth and of its credit, this valuable system, which has contributed more to the power of that nation than all the victories of its admirals.

In a word, it is time that the French nation should know all her advantages and how to profit of them. It is time for her to repair all the injury she has sustained in this respect, through the ignorance or criminal indifference of an oppressive Government, more careful of preserving at any price its despotic authority; more occupied in diplomatic intrigue or fiscal operations; more tenacious in maintaining the false splendor of a throne at the expense of the true interests of the people, than attentive to render productive, by every means in its power, their agriculture, their commerce, and their industry.

Doubtless there never was a more favorable occasion for procuring to our country the benefit of a navigation act. Numerous republican armies, familiarized with victory, being now fighting for her independence and her liberty against the very powers who are most interested in preventing us from enjoying such an act. Before the war it might have been sufficient for us to have made such an act merely with regard to England; such was the effect on Holland when Oliver Cromwell, in 1651, had a decree passed by the British Parliament.

At that epoch, according to the inquiries of one of our countrymen, the best informed at the present day in the knowledge of our true commercial and political interests, (Citizen Ducher,*) the maritime commerce of the English did not consist of more than 96,000 tons of transports; in 1790 it rose to more than 800,000 tons.

* If the Convention pass the present project of a navigation act into a decree, the country will be under obligations to Citizen Ducher, who, for upwards of two years past, has endeavored to obtain the adoption of this plan with indefatigable perseverance, as well in Committees of the National Assembly as by the publication of his writings. This is an act of justice which it affords me pleasure publicly to render to that excellent citizen.

Again: at that epoch, according to the interesting report presented to the Constituent Assembly on this subject by Citizen Delattre, "one-half of the navigation of England was carried on by foreigners. England has imperceptibly retaken her rights; towards the year 1700 foreigners possessed no more than the fifth part of this navigation; in 1725, only a little more than the ninth; in 1750, a little more than a twelfth; and in 1791 they possessed only the fourteenth part of it."

Our navigation a year ago was, in regard to foreign nations, still more unfavorable than the English navigation of 1651. Permit me here to give, in a concise manner, the striking calculations which were laid before you on this subject, in the month of December last, by the ex-Minister of the Home Department, in the table containing the amount of the exterior commerce of the Republic of France.

The maritime transportation of our exchange with the Europeans, the Levant, the Barbary States, and the Anglo Americans, estimating on a mean year, from 1787 to 1789 inclusive, has employed, in the whole, 16,225 vessels, measuring 1,184,170 tons, which, taking one with another, at 36 livres the ton, would produce 42,630,120 livres of freight.

There have been employed in this transportation, during the same period, only 3,763 French vessels, measuring, in the whole, 295,251 tons, making, at the same rate, 10,808,316 livres of freight.

That is to say, the French flag has appeared to come in for only a little more that two-tenths, whilst the English flag has participated therein to nearly the amount of four-tenths, and that of other nations in the remaining four-tenths.

In the first six months of 1792, in near six thousand vessels, measuring five hundred thousand tons, which have been in like manner employed on our commercial imports and exports to and from the same people, the French had but three-tenths of the total mass, whilst the vessels of England, and Holland, and the Hanseatic towns, had four-tenths, and the vessels of other nations the remaining three-tenths.

If we view this navigation under another aspect, that of our direct relations with each of the European States, of the Levant, Barbary, and North America, it will be seen that, during the same time, (taking the mean year of 1788 and 1789, inclusively,) there have been mixed in the maritime transportation of our exchanges: with Spain, one hundred and ninety-nine vessels other than French or Spanish, deduction being made of the foreign vessels which might have intermeddled in this carrying trade under either of the two flags; with Sardinia, two hundred and sixty-nine vessels, also intermedial; with the Republic of Genoa, two hundred and sixty-one similar vessels; with Holland, two hundred and fifty-three similar vessels. In a word, with all the States of which I have spoken, two thousand three hundred and sixty-eight vessels employed in indirect commerce, and whose tonnage amounts to two hundred and thirty thousand six hundred tons; which, valued at thirty-six per ton of freight, one with another, amount to eight millions three hundred and one thousand six hundred livres, carried off with inpunity in one year from our carrying trade, merely from the want of a navigation act in France, without counting upon the considerable advantages which would otherwise result from it, for her industry and commerce, for ship building in her ports, and for the employment of the whole or even the half of these two thousand three hundred and sixty-eight intermediate vessels.

It must, then, appear plainly to the conviction of every person that nothing would contribute more to the prosperity of our navigation, and consequently to every branch of our commerce and industry, than the adoption of an act which, by severely excluding all foreigners who hitherto have forcibly taken from our fellow-citizens the richest portion, if I may so express myself, of their patrimony, would, in the same proportion, increase the amount of their direct relations with foreign nations.

Let us hasten, then, citizens, to restore to our country all her rights, by adopting, in this respect, a grand system worthy of all that we have done for liberty.

If, at the epoch at which I now speak, our navigation is proportionally more languishing than that of England was when the genius of Cromwell gave her that so renowned act, let us hope that, by consecrating it in our maritime legislation, our navigation will in a short time acquire the same degree of splendor as that of our rivals. With more than two hundred and fifty leagues of coast on the ocean and the channel, and more than one hundred on the Mediterranean, with ports as secure, as extensive, and commodious, with an infinite number of havens, of dock yards, of manufactures of every kind; with an immensity of people as enterprising, as industrious, with incalculable territorial riches, and a mass of colonial commodities superior to that of all the powers of Europe united; and, above all, with a free and republican constitution, let us hope that France, freed from the yoke of the feudal system, and that of the fiscal, inseparably connected with it; delivered from her kings, her nobles, her priests, raised to the happy condition of depending on those laws only which are made by herself, and not obliged to receive them from any power on earth—let us hope, I say, that, in such a state of things, France, with an act of navigation, would behold the rapid envelopement of all the seeds of public and private prosperity which she contains in her bosom. Let us also hope that the decree you are about to pass will prove more efficacious for your obtaining a peace with the belligerent maritime powers than if they were to lose one hundred of their best vessels; and as to those who at this moment preserve circumspect neutrality towards you, be persuaded that the inevitable effect of your navigation act will be the attaching of them to you by indissoluble ties. All will be eager to seek an alliance with that European power from whom they will derive most benefit by the suppression of indirect navigation and the immensity of its consumers. Every one, from the moment of the promulgation of your decree, will pray and perhaps make use of secret efforts to procure you an advantageous peace, which doubtless, at present, they have some interest in preventing; and, besides, your independence, your political liberty, the establishment of your republican constitution, will be to them, as much as to yourselves, a subject of triumph and general victory.

The navigation act, as I have already said, is the basis of the commercial constitution of the Republic, or rather it is in this respect a true constitutional act. All the other laws upon maritime navigation should only be viewed as corollaries of this act, provisions as to the manner of its execution; in a word, merely regulating laws.

The latter may be successfully presented to you by your committees. The most interesting of these are relative to the tonnage of vessels, upon the means of multiplying ship building, and of bringing them to more perfection; upon forms of licenses and passports; upon the means of discovering and preventing francisations, simulèes, &c.; and, above all, upon a better tariff of rates of navigation, without which the constitutional act, in this respect, cannot produce all the effect which we have a right to expect from it.

Your committee will now confine itself to laying before you the project of that act. By prohibiting all intermediate navigation between you and each foreign nation, it extends this prohibition, not only to the transportation of the commodities, merchandises, or productions imported, of their growth, production, or manufacture, but also to the transportation of those imported from the ordinary ports of sale, and of the first exportation. It is necessary that such a prohibition should be as extensive as it could be made, without which a navigation act would become a mere illusory measure. The English, from whom we borrow this system, have given it that extension, and, indeed, they are to be applauded for it.

The necessity of determining the requisite qualities for enjoying the privileges of a French vessel, that is to say, for the exclusive admission to carry on our direct navigation, in concurrence with the vessels of the people from whom we receive our articles of supply; this necessity, I say, was an immediate consequence of the prohibition of all indirect navigation. The project of the act regulates these qualities; it also determines the only evidence by which we could know the vessels of the nation with whom we may trade; and it is easily perceived that if we did not impose, in this respect, those conditions which are most conformable to our interest, every day crowds of intermediate vessels would borrow the flag of such nations, and we should have employed but half the means for abolishing indirect navigation. Besides, these conditions have a tendency to favor the direct navigation and commerce of such nations. By them it is put in the happy necessity of multiplying by every means its ship building, nautics, and maritime population; and if in the meanwhile its own vessels and mariners are insufficient for the exportation of its commodities and merchandises, then it belongs to us alone to supply that deficiency, and our navigation would then receive a further increase from this source, and our commerce an additional degree of prosperity.

Thus everything concurs, citizens, to induce you to adopt the project of the navigation act, which I am instructed to present to you. It is a national right you are about to proclaim, after having solemnly recognized the sacred rights of man and of citizen, and founded the freest constitution under the globe.

If all nations ought to recognize the equality, the liberty of nature, and the safety of society, in the exposition of the doctrines of that immortal declaration, all the maritime nations ought to recognize the rights of property in the dispositions of our navigation act. Would to Heaven that all had the courage or the wisdom to follow our example. Then there would be no exclusive privilege between one nation and another; and were the act of navigation adopted by all the maritime powers of the globe, it would in some degree realize that indefinite commercial liberty which, without doubt, is the first element of commerce, but which at present, in particular, is not suitable to the interests of any commercial nation.

With so many powerful inducements to decree an act of navigation, you doubtless will not, in the existing circumstances, be withheld by the apprehension that such a disposition would injure the obtaining of supplies for the Republic, which they are obliged to draw forth from foreigners. It is an acknowledged principle with the English themselves, and constantly practiced among them, that, in times of war, neutral vessels are excepted, of right, from the dispositions of the navigation act. This act, therefore, will not add to those restrictions which the maritime war at present imposes on the maritime transportation of our exchanges or of our supplies; and neutral vessels will continue to bring us everything which we dare not confide to our own.

Neither will you be deterred by an apprehension of injuring the personal interests of some hundreds of cosmopolite capitalists, of selfish Commissioners, for whom the want of a navigation act in France has been the principal, the most fruitful source of their colossal fortunes. The general interest of the country, that of her laborers, of her manufacturers, of her artists, of her seamen, her merchants, and all her sans culottes, to whom you will assure employment and bread. These reasons should determine you; these reasons should influence you exclusively in your deliberations. All will bless you; all will look upon the act of navigation as one of the most precious gifts you could bestow on your countrymen, next to the constitutional charter which you have just digested. When Oliver Cromwell had, through the medium of his Parliament, established a navigation act, all the ports of England manifested, by illuminations, the joy which that memorable act gave them; and the English people forgot for a moment that they received this gift from the hands of a tyrant. How great, then, ought the transports of our fellow-citizens to be when they receive your decree from the same hands which have given them the declaration of rights and the French constitution.

May France be enabled, in the end, therefore, to boast also of having a navigation act; may it henceforward be the basis of her policy, as it is about being that of her commerce. May she soon become more rich, more flourishing, more happy than she has been under the most brilliant reigns of her despots, and never treat with foreign powers without her constitution in one hand and her navigation in the other; and astonished Europe will, doubtless, see her merchants become one day her only ambassadors, like those of London and Amsterdam formerly, negotiating at foreign courts the most important interests of their country; and, after having weighed the destinies of the two worlds, and secured the prosperity and glory of their country, resuming the peaceable pursuits of commerce.

The following is the project of the decree:

No. 122.

Copy of the Act of Navigation of the French Republic, referred to in the foregoing.

The National Convention, after having heard the report of their Committees of Marine, of Commerce, and of Public Safety, considering that the French nation has the incontestable right of securing, by every method, the prosperity of her agriculture, commerce, and industry; that nothing has a more direct tendency to this end than a navigation act; and that, in the solemn declaration of this act she only makes use of the same right which she acknowledges to belong to all other nations, decrees as follows:

ARTICLE 1. That no foreign commodities, productions, or merchandises, shall be imported but directly by French vessels, or those belonging to the inhabitants of the country of which they are the growth, produce, or manufacture, or to the inhabitants of the country of the ordinary ports of sale and first exportation; the officers and three-fourths of the crew of a foreign vessel being of the country whose flag the vessel bears; the whole on pain of confiscation of the vessel and cargo, and a fine of three thousand livres jointly and severally against the owners, consignees, and agents of the vessel and cargo, the captain and lieutenant of the vessel.

ARTICLE 2. That foreign vessels shall not transport from one French port to another French port any commodities, productions, or merchandises, of the growth, produce, or manufacture of France, the colonies or possessions of France, under the penalties declared in article 1.

ARTICLE 3. That, after the 10th of August next, no vessel shall be reputed French, nor enjoy the privileges of a French vessel, unless such vessel shall have been built in the colonies or possessions of France, or declared a good prize taken from an enemy, or confiscated for contravention of the laws of France, and unless the officers and three-fourths of the crew are Frenchmen.

Mr. T. Pinckney, Minister to Great Britain, to the Secretary of State.

No. 124.

Mr. Genet to the Secretary of State.

PHILADELPHIA, July 9, 1793, second year of the Republic.

SIR: I have already frequently had the honor of conversing with you on the revolting treatment which the English vessels-of-war use on the high seas towards American vessels. I have informed you of the severe visits to which they subject them, and of the seizure they make on board of them, and under the protection of the flag of the United States, of the persons and property of the French citizens.

The reports of all the navigators attest the truth of these facts, and the complaints enclosed present new proofs. I request you, sir, to communicate them to the President of the United States, and to be so obliging as to inform me of the measures he has taken, or those he proposes to take, to cause our enemies to respect the flag of the United States as much as we ourselves do, and to have delivered to our fellow-citizens the property of which they have unjustly been deprived.

I must observe to you, sir, that as the English will probably continue to carry off with impunity our citizens and their property on board of American vessels, without embarrassing themselves with the philosophical principles proclaimed by the President of the United States, the engagements we have contracted with you, placing us in the most disadvantageous position with respect to our enemies, in depriving us of the privilege of using, at every point, with regard to them, the right of reprisals, it is as necessary for your as for our interest that we should agree to take other measures. I expect immediately, sir, a positive answer from the Federal Government on this subject; and I hope that it will comport with the dignity and justice of the American people, who ought not to require, if they are not at present in a situation to compel the English to justice, whom they have formerly conquered, that we should expose ourselves and them longer, by a misplaced complaisance, to the insults of that nation, towards whom generous proceedings generally lead only to new outrages.

Circular letter from James Wood, Lieutenant Governor of Virginia, to the commandants of counties in which are ports of navigation.

RICHMOND, August 22, 1793.

SIR: It having been decided by the President of the United States that no armed vessel, which has been or shall be originally fitted out, in any part of the United States, as a cruiser or privateer, by either of the parties at war, is to have asylum in any of the ports of the United States; in case any vessel within the foregoing description should arrive in any port or harbor within the limits of your county, you are to cause her to be ordered to depart immediately; and in case of her refusal you are to take effectual measures to oblige her to depart. Force is not to be resorted to until every proper effort has been previously made to procure the early departure without it. If any such vessel or vessels shall have sent or brought, subsequent to the 5th instant, or should hereafter send or bring any prize or prizes into any port or harbor within your county, you will cause such prize or prizes to be immediately secured by your militia, for the purpose of being restored to the former owners. The following are the names of the privateers comprehended within the meaning of this letter, that have hitherto come to the knowledge of the Government of the United States:

Citizen Genet, Sans Culotte, Vanqueur de Bastile, fitted out at Charleston, South Carolina; Petit Democrat, fitted out at Philadelphia; Carmagnole, fitted out at Delaware.

You will be pleased to transmit in writing to the Governor all the cases, with the evidence thereon, which may occur in pursuance of this communication.

I have the honor to be, &c.,

JAMES WOOD.

No. 130.

Circular letter from the Secretary of State to the merchants of the United States.

PHILADELPHIA, August 27, 1793.

GENTLEMEN: Complaint having been made to the Government of the United States of some instances of unjustifiable vexation and spoliation, committed on our merchant vessels by the privateers of the powers at war, and it being possible that other instances may have happened of which no information has been given to the Government, I have it in charge from the President to assure the merchants of the United States, concerned in foreign commerce or navigation, that due attention will be paid to any injuries they may suffer on the high seas or in foreign countries, contrary to the law of nations, or to existing treaties; and that, on their forwarding hither well authenticated evidence of the same, proper proceedings will be adopted for their relief. The just and friendly dispositions of the several belligerent powers afford well-founded expectation that they will not hesitate to take effectual measures for restraining their armed vessels from committing aggressions and vexations on our citizens or their property.

There being no particular portion or description of the mercantile body pointed out by the laws for receiving communications of this nature, I take the liberty of addressing it to the merchants of Charleston, for the State of South Carolina, and of requesting that, through them, it may be made known to all those of their State whom it may concern.

Information will be freely received either from the individuals aggrieved or from any associations of merchants who will be pleased to take the trouble of giving it in a case so interesting to themselves and their country.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, gentlemen, &c.,

"6. That the Secretary of War, to whom I communicated the wish of our Governments of the Windward Islands, to receive promptly some fire-arms and some cannon, which might put into a state of defence possessions guarantied by the United States, had the front to answer me, with an ironical carelessness, that the principles established by the President did not permit him to lend us so much as a pistol. 7. That the Secretary of the Treasury, with whom I had a conversation on the proposition which I made to convert almost the whole American debt, by means of an operation of finance authorized by law, into flour, rice, grain, salted provisions, and other objects of which France had the most pressing need, added to the refusal, which he had already made officially of favoring this arrangement, the positive declaration that, even if it were practicable, the United States could not consent to it, because England would not fail to consider this extraordinary reimbursement, furnished to a nation with which she is at war, as an act of hostility."

The same exclusive article has been stipulated, as was before observed, by Great Britain in her treaty with France, and, indeed, is to be found in the treaties between most nations."

Extract from the speech of the President of the United States to both Houses of Congress, December 3, 1793.

"As soon as the war in Europe had embraced those powers with whom the United States have the most extensive relations, there was reason to apprehend that our intercourse with them might be interrupted, and our disposition for peace drawn into question by the suspicions too often entertained by belligerent nations. It seemed, therefore, to be my duty to admonish our citizens of the consequence of a contraband trade, and of hostile acts to any of the parties, and to obtain, by a declaration of the existing legal state of things, an easier admission of our right to the immunities belonging to our situation. Under these impressions the proclamation which will be laid before you was issued.

"In this posture of affairs, both new and delicate, I resolved to adopt general rules, which should conform to the treaties and assert the privileges of the United States. These were reduced into a system, which will be communicated to you. Although I have not thought myself at liberty to forbid the sale of the prizes permitted by our treaty of commerce with France to be brought into our ports, I have not refused to cause them to be restored when they were taken within the protection of our territory, or by vessels commissioned or equipped in a warlike form within the limits of the United States.

The Secretary of State to the French Minister in the United States, dated January 28, 1794.

SIR: I am induced to believe, from your letter of the 23d instant, enclosing a complaint in behalf of Martin Villeneuve, that the act of Congress concerning Consuls and Vice Consuls, which was passed on the 14th of April, 1792, may possibly have escaped your notice.

You ascribe to the Judge of the district of New York some delinquency, and an instruction or warrant appears to have issued from Consul Hauterive to Mr. Willet, the Sheriff. Perhaps you will discover that, on such an occasion, neither the Judge nor the Sheriff is proper to be resorted to—the Marshal of New York and his deputies are the competent officers for aiding in the execution of any precept under the Consular Convention. If, however, you shall view the case in a different light, after examining the first section of that act, I shall, without delay, attend to any remarks which you may think proper to make.

I have the honor to be, &c.,

EDM. RANDOLPH.

Secretary of State to the French Minister, dated Philadelphia, February 7, 1794.

SIR: I do myself the honor of informing you that the French ship L'Orient, of Bengal, now lying in the port of Philadelphia, attracts the attention of Government. It is represented that on her arrival she was the private ship of some company in France, and, though armed, was without a public commission; that possession has been since taken of her, under your authority, for the use of the French nation; that, as an evidence of her being destined to be used in public service, the uniform of France appears to be worn by those who are attached to her; and that she is to be commissioned within the United States to cruise upon the other belligerent powers. This last circumstance, when connected with those preceding, will, if it be true, be immediately seen to infringe the rules prescribed by the President, and now demands the repetition of the former declaration that the giving of such a commission is inadmissible. You will suffer me therefore to expect an answer explanatory of this affair, and if any intention of commissioning the L'Orient has been entertained that it will be renounced. The removal of suspicion, at its earliest stage, is the surest mode of continuing between the United States and France that harmony which it will be always my wish to maintain.

SIR: I am informed that the appeals which were filed in the cases of the Catharine and William Tell, at New York, are already withdrawn, or likely to be immediately withdrawn. The consequence of this step will be to put them and their cargoes into the possession of the captors, and perhaps eventually out of the reach of Government. You spoke to me on this subject, and I understood from you that you would take care that the appeal on the Catharine at least should be continued. Let me beg the favor of you to come up immediately to General Knox, in order that proper measures may be concerted on this occasion.

SIR: I do myself the honor of informing you that I am apprehensive, from the information which I received last night, of the appeals lodged in the cases of the Catharine and William Tell having been already withdrawn, or being about to be withdrawn without delay. I understood, from our conversation on this subject, that they were to be continued until the depositions should be forwarded to the Executive. Unless this should be done, the possession will be immediately surrendered by the marshal to the captors, and new measures for regaining possession may be executed with difficulty during the absence of the Governor from the city of New York. I must, therefore, beg the favor of your immediate interposition to prevent the dismission of the appeals.

I am, sir, your most obedient servant,

Extract from a report of Mr. Edm. Randolph, Secretary of State, to the President of the United States, dated Philadelphia, March 14, 1794.

I did myself the honor of informing you, the other day, that the House of Representatives would probably remit to my office the documents which related to the vexations and spoilations on our trade, conceiving that they were of a nature purely Executive. Yesterday the Senate, as if they meant to take up the subject in some shape or other, passed a vote, as I have heard, calling for an abstract, estimates of the value of the property injured, &c. It is not understood, however, that this ought to arrest the proceedings of the President if he should think a demand of compensation, in behalf of each individual, advisable.

You have already expressed your sense on that subject, and I shall begin immediately to prepare separate statements.

But, sir, when I run over the long list of damage and confiscation under which the citizens of the United States are now groaning; when I conjecture the amount of the mercantile capital which must be lost to our country, already too deficient, in that respect, for its own independence; when I know that many individuals will actually become bankrupts by this unexpected invasion of their fortunes; I consider the tardy modes of ordinary negotiation as a refinement in torturing them with a hope, which, if ever fulfilled, will be accomplished only after a series of years. Nay, more. If the Government shall suspend its interposition until all the expensive forms of the superior foreign courts shall be exhausted, it will, in many instances, produce no other effect than to invite the possessors of a title remnant to throw away even that also.

I must acknowledge that the merchants who have been impoverished by this high-handed rigor seem to me to have a peculiar claim upon the most vigorous exertions of the Executive. If the resolutions proposed for adding 15,000 men to the military establishment should be carried, or a military countenance, for the purpose of defence should be assumed, by a proper modification of the militia and a complete military apparatus, redress for past injuries will not be treated as hitherto; we shall not fear insults in our own borders, nor meet with it abroad, from an opinion of our impotence. Under such circumstances I submit, sir, to your consideration whether it may not be expedient to send to England some temperate and sensible man, without a particle of the diplomatic character, who, under the particular instruction of Mr. Pinckney, may manage the discussion of the respective claims. The compensation for his services cannot be an affair of consequence; he will be a solicitor only, to execute the drudgery which Mr. Pinckney cannot perform; and there will be no danger of his contravening any view of our minister, as he will be always under his command. Such a person will go charged with all the necessary information, so as to render delay unnecessary for the collection of proof.

Report from Mr. Edmund Randolph, Secretary of State, to the President of the United States, dated Philadelphia, March 31, 1794.

The laying of Mr. Fauchet's letter before Congress came into my mind. But I did not observe upon it, because he has given no answer whether a passport for the despatches on board may not be sufficient, or how he would wish the business to be modified. When that comes, it will probably be time enough to consider how far the President ought to be sending every application for relaxing the embargo to Congress; and whether there is not something too strong in excepting, by a new resolution, a vessel notoriously loaded with flour for France from the operation of the embargo. I thought that the liberal construction of the resolution would permit her to proceed. But, as you have determined otherwise, I cannot see the propriety of making a special rule for her, or of the President being the vehicle to Congress of such a proposition. Possibly Mr. Fauchet may place the subject upon other ground. I speak only upon the case as it now exists.

SIR: I have at length prepared statements of the cases of vexation and spoliation, upon which certain citizens of the United States conceive themselves entitled to relief from your Government. Perhaps an interview between us might shorten the remonstrances which I have to make, and cut off a considerable delay. Permit me, therefore, to express a wish that you would name some day in the next week, when I may submit to you the complaints of my countrymen, as it will be a circumstance of great convenience to adjust the claims without the tedious form of a diplomatic discussion. Report from Mr. Edmund Randolph, Secretary of State, to the Vice President of the United States and President of the Senate, dated Philadelphia, May 20, 1794.

SIR: I now do myself the honor of transmitting to the Senate the abstract of vexations and spoliations of our commerce which was required by their resolution of the 13th day of March last. The volume sent will show that such a business could not be immediately completed. Indeed, sir, I was compelled, by the burden of business daily depending and arising in the office, to engage a gentleman of the law to assist me in preparing the abstract.

Permit me to remark, that the documents which have been forwarded to me are, in many instances, so imperfect as to render it impossible to make such regular statements as I wished.

I ought, at the same time, to observe, that on the second day of March, 1794, when I wrote my letter to the President of the United States, the cases of complaint against the British were thirty-two; against the French, twenty-six; against the Spanish, ten; and against the Dutch, one. The propriety, therefore, of what that letter contains will not be determined by the great list which has been exhibited since; nor will it be supposed that I have ever undertaken, or do now undertake, to vouch for a single fact; having made, and being able to make, no inquiry beyond the allegations of the parties interested.

The abstract would have been drawn in the first instance had it not been intended to endeavor to settle the business by representations to the foreign courts. Unless the Senate desire that the papers be retained here, it is probable that many of them will be sent abroad.

I have the honor, sir, to be, with great respect, your most obedient servant,

EDM. RANDOLPH.

SIR: The President of the United States being desirous of manifesting that, after the justice done by the French Republic to his complaint against the former minister, he wishes not that a secondary and perhaps an involuntary instrument should be punished; and at the same time of complying with the solicitation of Mr. Fauchet, I am to request you to cause to be discontinued the prosecution which has been instituted in behalf of the United States against Mr. Juteau, Chancellor of the Consulate at Boston, on the subject of arming the privateer Roland.

But the President, trusting that the baneful practice will not be repeated, will not, on this occasion, distinguish those citizens of the United States who were employed on board the Roland as privateer's men from Mr. Juteau. He therefore is willing that a similar prosecution against them may be also discontinued.

Secretary of State to the United States Ministers at France, Holland, and Great Britain, and the Commissioner of Spain, enclosing a decision of the President, dated Philadelphia, June 18, 1794.

SIR: I do myself the honor of enclosing to you the determination of the President of the United States as to the sailing of the vessels-of-war of any of the belligerent nations from the United States. The rule being reasonable in itself and conformable to the law of nations, is now transmitted to you with a hope that you will cause it to be promulgated among the ships-of-war, whether public or private, belonging to your nation.

I have the honor to be, with respect, your most obedient servant,

EDM. RANDOLPH.

"When any vessel, whether of war or merchandise, public or private, belonging to any belligerent nation, shall depart from the United States beyond the jurisdictional line of the United States on the ocean, and a vessel of war, whether public or private, belonging to another of the belligerent nations being adverse, shall, at the time of the departure of the first mentioned vessel, be within such jurisdictional line, the last mentioned vessel-of-war shall not sail beyond such jurisdictional line until the expiration of twenty-four hours after the departure of the first mentioned vessel.

"If any vessel-of-war belonging to a belligerent nation shall sail contrary to the foregoing rule, she shall be deemed to have violated the law of nations, and the Government of the United States will take measures for causing to be restored any prize taken by her and brought within the power of the United States.

"This rule shall commence forthwith, and shall be notified to all the foreign ministers residing near the United States."

No. 170.

Secretary of State to the British Minister, dated Philadelphia, June 21, 1794.

SIR: After acknowledging the receipt of your letter of the 8th instant concerning certain British vessels brought, at different periods, as prizes into American ports, I have the honor to inform you that the proof adduced in behalf of the ship William of Glasgow has been duly considered, and it not being competent to establish the place of her capture to be within the particular protection of the United States, the captors will not meet with any further interference from the Government.

The case of the Pilgrim is truly conceived by you. It was not known until after the 5th of April last, when the letter promising restitution was written, that she had been sold to an American citizen. If the prosecution ordered by Government, for the purpose of capacitating it to make specific restitution of the vessel, shall not succeed, it has been, and continues to be, its determination to consider the Pilgrim as standing upon an equal title to compensation with any of the vessels illegally captured.

The subject of compensation for vessels illegally captured was communicated by the President to Congress at the commencement of their last session, but it happened that no provision was then made by law to enable the Executive to fulfill the expectation given. As your letter was received after his departure, I cannot ascertain what ulterior measure may be contemplated by him, to give efficacy to the opinion which he has already expressed in favor of compensation. But I will immediately transmit a copy of that letter to him, and hope to be able in a few days to acquaint you with his decision.

I have the honor, sir, to be, with great respect, your most obedient servant,

EDM. RANDOLPH.

No. 171.

Report from Mr. Edmund Randolph, Secretary of State, to the President of the United States, dated Philadelphia, June 22, 1794.

SIR: I did myself the honor of writing to you yesterday and the day before.

It has since become necessary to decide the case of the ship William of Glasgow, which was said to have been captured by a French cruiser within the protection of our coast. But the evidence having been deemed by us all incompetent to establish the fact, both the French and English ministers have been informed that she will no longer be withheld by Government from the captors.

There has been the same unanimity in promising to Mr. Hammond that the Pilgrim, a British vessel, captured by an illegal privateer, and purchased by an American citizen, shall be placed upon an equal footing of compensation with other prizes of the same kind, if a prosecution ordered to be instituted against the present proprietor shall not enable the Government to restore her specifically.

But Mr. Hammond has also requested to know what measures are to be adopted upon the subject of compensation in general. Colonel Hamilton and General Knox are of opinion that Mr. Jay should be instructed to make this compensation an article in a treaty, and that Mr. Hammond be made acquainted with the instruction. Their reasons are set forth in enclosed paper. I am no less strong in favor of compensation than they are, but differ from them as to the nature of the stipulation, which is now to come from the President; the following being my view of the matter:

When compensation was first talked of, it was thought advisable that the President should declare it to be his opinion that it was incumbent on the United States to make it. Beyond this he had at no time gone, either in the communication which he directed to Mr. Hammond or in that which he sent to Congress on the 5th of December, 1793, nor ought he, in my judgment, ever to go further than to repeat his opinion and again to urge Congress.

1. For the Constitution forbids money to be drawn from the Treasury but in consequence of appropriations by law. If, therefore, the President had undertaken to bind the United States absolutely, it would have departed from the spirit at least of that instrument.

2. This subject has been submitted to Congress. Why they did not complete it is unknown to me, but they may take it up still. The proposition from the Secretaries of the Treasury and of War will, if it should succeed, establish a precedent entirely new. It will begin the practice of providing by a treaty with a foreign nation for sums of money which the Legislature shall hesitate about granting.

3. It is unnecessary to begin such a practice on this occasion by a particular instruction, because Mr. Jay's general instructions are full enough for the object, if he should find it expedient to enter into the arrangement.

4. If it should be asked what is the inconvenience of repeating expressly a power already vested virtually in Mr. Jay, it may be asked, in turn, what is to be the benefit? It is said that it will be a fresh proof of the sincerity of our professions to Great Britain. But even in this view it will be at least as good a proof of sincerity, when it is delivered from the lips of Mr. Jay to Lord Grenville, as if it were written by me to Mr. Hammond. There is, besides, a positive inconvenience. When Mr. Jay's powers were drawn, it was not decided that Congress would not grant compensation, and therefore the leaving the business to his discretion was in no respect improper. But now to give an instruction, in order to do by the President and Senate what was omitted to be done by the whole Legislature, will be exposed to this construction: that the President first recommends a thing to be done by both branches of Congress, and when it appears that the House of Representatives will not originate a bill for the purpose, measures are adopted to accomplish the end by excluding them.

5. Why need the President increase his engagements for compensation when the failure to do so cannot be imputed by way of blame?

It is therefore submitted to his consideration whether it may not be sufficient to say to Mr Hammond, that, as it happened that no provision was created by Congress for the compensation required, the President will again impress upon them his opinion that it is obligatory on the United States to make it, and to grant funds adequate to the case.

Mr. Bradford is not at hand for consultation.

I have the honor, sir, to be, with the highest respect, your obedient servant,

EDM. RANDOLPH.

Note from the Secretary of State to the Secretaries of the Treasury and of War and the Attorney General of the United States, dated June 30, 1794.

The Secretary of State has the honor of informing the Secretary of the Treasury, the Secretary of War, and the Attorney General of the United States, that he has this day received a Convention, bearing date the 27th of March, 1794, between Denmark and Sweden, for the maintenance of the rights of neutral navigation. It is proper to notify the gentlemen that Mr. Jay is instructed, if he should find it necessary and expedient, to sound the ministers of those nations at the Court of London upon this very subject.

The affair being thus unexpectedly ripened, our adjustment with Great Britain uncertain, and the confidence in Mr. Jay's discretion not permitting a doubt that a power upon this head would be otherwise than prudently exercised, the Secretary of State takes the liberty of submitting to the consideration of the gentlemen, whether it may not be advantageous that the President should send a commission and power to some person in Europe as a diplomatic character, for the foregoing temporary object of forming a concert with those nations; enclosing, however, both the commission and powers to Mr. Jay, who shall, from his view of things in London, decide whether or not such a mission may produce good to the United States, and deliver or withhold them accordingly.

SIR: Not a day passes which does not bring some report of the British cruisers capturing American vessels. As far as we are able to judge from the representations of the parties interested, American property and American bottoms are searched and seized, under a variety of frivolous pretexts, and in some instances in our very bays. But after making every allowance for these reports and these representations, I have no doubt that the schooner Betsy and the barque John, belonging to Messrs. Read and Forde, merchants in this city, which have been lately carried into Bermuda by the Experiment privateer of that island have been arrested without color of excuse. Increasing as these depredations seem to be, and counteracting as they do the expectations which have been formed of an amicable adjustment between the United States and Great Britain; nay, reviving as is too obvious, the spirit of the instructions of November 6, 1793, I trust that you will not confine your answer to the observation that if these vessels be innocent they will be acquitted; I rather hope that if you possess any information which may put an end to this constant and exasperating invasion of our property you will transmit it to such places as that it may more certainly reach the cruisers, and particularly that you will furnish the agent of Messrs. Read and Forde with such letters as may shelter their vessels and effects. I restrain myself to the request that any intelligence may be forwarded; but, sir, if you have powers also on the subject, you will be convinced of the necessity of exerting them to prevent this hourly sacrifice of American substance and these violent trials of American patience.

PHILADELPHIA, 26 Vindemiaire, 3d year of the French Republic, October 17, 1794, (O. S.)

SIR: I conceive how painful it must be to you to observe me recurring so often to the same questions, and speaking to you so frequently on the same affairs; be persuaded that it is not less so to me to have daily new motives of complaint against the abuse made of the laws in order to persecute our privateers. You announce to me that La Perseverance, prize to the Sans Pareil, had been delivered to the captors by order of the Governor of Rhode Island. In contempt of that decision, the English agents have just created new difficulties—a new decision is still expected to take place on the first Monday of November. It is impossible, sir, for this state of things to continue much longer. You are sensible how necessary it will be to retrench from our treaty the article which reciprocally permits the ships-of-war of the two nations to conduct to, and sell their prizes in, their respective ports, should this right become illusory and void by the difficulty thrown in the way of its execution. I proposed a method, as simple as it is just, for putting an end to this tyrannical chicanery—this method was to require security from those who prosecuted prizes as illegal. Were this measure adopted, it would render our enemies less ingenious in their proceedings, and prevent them from bringing so many actions of the justice of which they themselves are not convinced. Your silence led me to presume that you were of opinion with me on this point. I am undeceived by the recent complaints which crowd upon me from all parts. I expect, sir, that the Federal Government will put an end to these persecutions by the mode I have proposed, or by any other which its wisdom may suggest.

Permit me, sir, to call to your attention, at the same time, the outrage committed on board the Favorite by men clothed in American uniform. Among the arms which they have pillaged, there are some of which the Republic stand in great need. I hope that forms will not add to the crime already committed delays injurious to the interests of the French Republic, outraged by an act so contrary to the law of nations and to treaties.

Secretary of State to the British Minister, dated Philadelphia, October 23, 1794.

SIR: Under the authority of a letter addressed, on the 5th ultimo, by Captain Alexander F. Cochrane, commander of his Britannic Majesty's ship Thetis, to Mr. John Hamilton, the British Consul at Norfolk, in Virginia, I am compelled with pain to learn that all the captains of his Britannic Majesty's ships are particularly ordered to convey to Halifax every person not being a French citizen, but belonging to any nation at peace with Great Britain, who may be found on board of French privateers, there to be tried as a pirate.

To this order, so far as it dooms to the penalties of piracy American citizens under the circumstances stated, I oppose the rights of a neutral nation. These rights are pressed with the more confidence, as it is not pretended to declare them innocent of all offence. Far from it. We deem our citizens criminal who perpetrate hostility under any of the belligerent flags, and it is too notorious to have escaped you that this is the decided language of our courts.

But are they pirates? To answer this important question in the affirmative, would be to admire rigor rather than conciliation; to estimate as of light concern the jeopardy into which the peace of nations is thrown; to confront the genuine doctrines of the law of nations, and even of the English law.

It will not be controverted that he who acts hostilely under a proper commission cannot be a pirate, nor yet that a commission granted to French privateers, covers from the crime of piracy French citizens who sail under it. But the order referred to, if at all justifiable, can be justified upon this ground only, that such a commission does not spread its protection over American citizens who may be a part of the crew.

The practice of nations is often quoted to illustrate the principles of general law; and stipulations of treaties are high evidences of that practice. Hence, when in the treaties of the United States with France and Holland the citizens and subjects of one contracting party are expressly prohibited from taking a commission from the enemy of the other, and the peril of piracy is attached to him who accepts the commission, but is not extended to subordinate mariners, it is natural to conclude that, without this prohibition, even the principal himself would not have been a pirate. For although treaties are sometimes declaratory of a pre-existing law, yet do they more often enact what otherwise would not have existed. And in this instance the treaty would seem to contemplate the introduction of a new arrangement; it being a subject which the parties appear to have had much at heart; and probably would not, if the piracy of the common sailors had been perfectly clear, have cast into doubt by naming him only as a pirate who was more obviously so than the inferior men within his command. A terror upon the body of seamen would have been far more effectual than upon individual captains or commanders; and notice of danger would have been the more humane, and was the more necessary to the former as they were more ignorant and more liable to seduction.

Vattel, indeed, in b. 3, c. 15, s. 229, while he considers foreigners in relation to other Governments, condemns those who take commissions to prey upon a nation absolutely innocent with respect to them as guilty of an infamous practice; but then he adds "la commission qu'ils reçoivent, en les assurant de l' indemnité, ne peut laver leur infamie." Thus he effaces the imputation of piracy.

This principle Molloy must have had in view when, in the 15th section of his chapter on piracy, he states the following case:

"A Dutchman, but naturalized by the Duke of Savoy, and living at Villa Franca in his dominions, procures a commission from the States of Holland, and coming to Leghorn there rode with the colors and ensigns of the Duke of Savoy. The ship Diamond being then in port, and having received her lading, was afterwards in her voyage surprised by that caper, and brought into Villa Franca, and there condemned and sold to one Poleman; which ship, afterwards coming from England, the plaintiffs having notice, made a seizure; and upon trial adjudication passed for the plaintiffs, the original proprietors. For though the ship-of-war and the captors were of Savoy, and carried thither, yet, being taken by virtue of a Dutch commission, by the law-marine she must be carried infra præsidia of that Prince or State, by virtue of whose commission she was taken. Nor can such carrying of the ensigns or colors of the Duke of Savoy, who was then in amity with the Crown of England, or the commander, though a subject of that Prince, make him a pirate, or subject them or those to whom they have transferred their interest of the prize, any ways to be questioned for the same criminaliter. For that the original quo ad as to the taking was lawful; as one enemy might take from an other," &c. (The rest of the case is unimportant on the present occasion.)

I must, therefore, make protestation against the treatment of sailors who may be citizens of the United States, and under the circumstances described by Captain Cochrane, as pirates; and I cannot but entertain a hope that your impressions will not differ from mine, especially when the assurance is repeated that our laws shall be enforced against any person violating them in this particular.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, sir, your most obedient servant,

EDM. RANDOLPH.

Secretary of State to Mr. T. Pinckney, Minister to Great Britain, dated Philadelphia, December 23, 1794.

DEAR SIR: My respect for your recommendation of Messrs. Talleyrand, Beaumetz, and Liancourt, and for the character of each of them, induces me to explain to you the reason why I have not been able to pay them that attention which I personally wished. It was a fact unknown to you, but too often impressed upon me indirectly to escape notice, that the French Republic would have learned with disgust that they had been received by the President. He having resolved not to receive them, I held it to be my duty to do violence to my individual regard for their characters by merging it in political considerations. I am sure, therefore, that you will accept this letter as an adequate apology for not indulging myself on this occasion with a demonstration of my esteem for your recommendation.

I have the honor to be, dear sir, &c.,

EDM. RANDOLPH.

Secretary of State to Mr. Hollingsworth, Attorney United States, Maryland District, dated Philadelphia, December 24, 1794.

SIR: I do myself the honor of enclosing to you the copy of a letter from the Minister of his Britannic Majesty, dated yesterday, relative to a prize called the Hope, carried into Baltimore by a privateer named "Le Peuple Francoise." You perceive that the privateer is supposed to be one of the proscribed. I must therefore request you to make an immediate inquiry into the case, and to do whatsoever the law authorizes. If the intervention of the Governor of your State should be necessary, you are at liberty to despatch an express to him at the public expense.

I have the honor to be, sir, with great esteem and respect, your most obedient servant,

EDM. RANDOLPH.

P. S. In case of the absence of Mr. Hollingsworth, the Collector will do what is necessary.

No. 191.

Secretary of State to Mr. Read, Attorney United States, Delaware District, dated Philadelphia, December 24, 1794.

SIR: I do myself the honor of enclosing to you a copy of a letter from Mr. Hammond, marking out some offenders against the laws of neutrality in your State. Permit me to ask your immediate attention to the subject, and to put the law in force against any citizens of the United States who may come within the criminality described by Mr. Hammond.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, sir, your most obedient servant,

EDM. RANDOLPH.

No. 192.

Secretary of State to the Secretary of War, dated Philadelphia, December 24, 1794.

SIR: Permit me to enclose to you a copy of a letter from Mr. Hammond, relative to a prize now at Baltimore, in the hands of a French privateer. If the routine in which this business has been conducted enables you to give fuller effect to what ought to be done on this occasion, than has been done by my letter to the Attorney for the District of Maryland, which is also enclosed, I will thank you to attend to it immediately.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, sir, your most obedient servant,

EDM. RANDOLPH.

No. 193.

Secretary of State to the British Minister, dated Philadelphia, December 24, 1794.

SIR: I do myself the honor of acknowledging your two letters of yesterday.

The Secretary of War, in whose Department the inquiry into the case of the supposed illicit privateer lies, has undertaken immediately to exercise this function, so far as relates to the vessel herself. I have enclosed a copy of your letter to the Attorney of the District of Delaware, and urged him to put the law in force against any citizens of the United States who come within the criminal description.

With respect to the British vessel at Baltimore, which is a prize to the French privateer Le Peuple Francoise, I have written to the Attorney of the District of Maryland to examine the case, and to do what the law authorizes. If the intervention of the Governor of that State should be required, he is instructed to apply for it. Should the Attorney be absent, the Collector is desired to open the letter, and he will find in the body of it an instruction to him to proceed. I shall also despatch a copy of the letter on this subject to the Secretary of War, requesting his co-operation, if there be anything within his Department.

I have the honor to be, sir, with great respect, your most obedient servant,

EDM. RANDOLPH.

No. 194.

Letter from Lieutenant Colonel Willis Wilson to the Governor of Virginia.

PORTSMOUTH, January 3, 1795.

SIR: I beg leave to enclose your excellency a copy of a note from the British Consul to the Collector of Customs of this port. The Collector, it seems, thought himself unwarranted to do anything in the business. I was applied to by an officer of the customs respecting the Consul's request or demand, and conceived it my duty to give orders to the commandant of the forts not to suffer the frigates to pass until your excellency's orders were had thereon. It is also my duty, for the sake of tranquillity, peace, and order, to make known that the commanders of his Britannic Majesty's ships have rendered themselves very obnoxious to the citizens of these two towns, as well as others, by lawless depredations on their property, and tyrannical impressments of native seamen; that there now lie at our wharves three French ships-of-war, with crews to the amount of six or seven hundred men; the British ships in question, if allowed to come up, must also lay at the wharves to go through their repairs; consequently, the necessary subordination cannot be had by the officers of either party over their seamen; I am, therefore, very apprehensive in such a case of dangerous consequences. In short, I think it very imprudent in the British to throw themselves in a port where there will be so great a majority of people with whom they are at war; for it is not in the power of all neutral ports to keep order, or protect their neutrality; I am sure it is not the case with this. If, therefore, they are entitled to repairs in our ports, I humbly conceive Yorktown, or any port where there may not be so large a concourse of French citizens, a much more eligible place for them.

I will be very thankful to your excellency for advice, whether the brigadiers have an existing command over the respective counties, or whether that command is vested in the Lieutenant Colonels and the Brigadier Generals confined to the brigades.

I have the honor to be, &c.

"The Minister Plenipotentiary shall stipulate positively and without reserve to the reciprocal exemption from the tonnage duty so necessary to our mercantile marine. This exemption, implicitly assured in the ports of the United States by the 4th and 5th articles of our commercial treaty, has never been executed therein, and since the organization of their customs a very burdensome tonnage duty has been rigorously exacted on our merchant vessels; even in 1793 a severity and an injustice were used which the American Government should not have suffered. But the respective naturalization of the French and the American citizens, proposed by Mr. Jefferson and desired by the French Nation, will facilitate this stipulation of a reciprocal exemption from tonnage, and render it less offensive to the powers who, in virtue of treaties, might claim a participation in the same advantages. As the casus fœderis would by this stipulation be changed in this respect."

No. 205.

Secretary of State to the British Minister, dated Philadelphia, August 14, 1795.

The undersigned, Secretary of State for the United States of America, in conformity with the assurance which he had the honor of giving to the Minister Plenipotentiary of his Britannic Majesty in the conference on the 13th of July, 1795, now communicates by memorial the determination which the President of the United States has thought proper to adopt.

It is known to the minister that, by the Constitution of the United States, the treaty between them and his Britannic Majesty, which was signed at London on the 19th day of November, 1794, partly depended for its existence on the advice and consent of the Senate, who were convened to deliberate thereon on the 8th of June, 1795, the earliest suitable time after the long delay in its arrival. The result is no less known to the minister to be that, on the 24th day of the last mentioned month, the Senate did consent to and advise the President of the United States to ratify the said treaty, on condition that there be added to it an article whereby it shall be agreed to suspend the operation of so much of the 12th article as respects the trade which his said Majesty thereby consents may be carried on between the United States and his islands in the West Indies in the manner and on the terms and conditions therein specified.

The preliminary course having thus been in affirmance of the treaty, and the final act being devolved on the President, he has, after duly appreciating the importance of closing all differences, determined to ratify the treaty in the manner advised and consented to by the Senate.

The undersigned is therefore authorized to declare that the treaty, duly ratified by the President, according to the advice and consent of the Senate, will be transmitted by the earliest opportunity to the person to be authorized to exchange the ratifications.

The President, not having foreseen the necessity of any further immediate negotiation with his Britannic Majesty, and having, in consequence thereof, assigned, at the latter end of the last year, to the minister accredited to his court an employment for a short time at another place, has contemplated Mr. John Q. Adams, the resident of the United States at the Hague, to transact what remains to be accomplished of the important business of the treaty, and for this purpose he will be instructed to repair immediately to London.

The President, under the influence of the same temper which has hitherto directed him, will also, without delay, take such measures relative to further friendly negotiations on the subject proposed by the Senate, and the several matters which, from want of time and other circumstances, were not perfected by the treaty, as will most effectually conduce to mutual convenience, and tend to promote mutual satisfaction and friendship.

But the undersigned is charged to declare that the sensibility of the President has been greatly excited by understanding that various captures have been lately made of American vessels laden with provisions, in consequence of a recent order, said to have been issued under the authority of his Britannic Majesty.

Mr. Adams will therefore be instructed to inquire if such an order has, in fact, been issued, as no copy thereof has been seen by the President; and, upon ascertaining its existence, he will make such representations as shall appear to be advisable, and particularly that the ratification of the President must not be construed into an admission of the legality of the said order.

EDM. RANDOLPH, Secretary of State.

No. 206.

Instructions to Mr. John Q. Adams relative to the exchange of ratifications of the treaty with Great Britain of 1794.

"Separate instructions for Mr. Adams relative to the exchange of ratifications, which Mr. Deas will be directed to execute if Mr. Adams does not go over before the 20th day of October, 1795, dated Department of State, August 25, 1795."

SIR: The first part of the business for which you are called to London, by my letter of the 14th inst., is the exchange of ratifications of the late treaty between the United States and Great Britain. The documents now transmitted, as relating thereto, are, 1st, a copy of that letter; 2d, a printed but authentic copy of the treaty, and resolution of the Senate advising the ratification; 3d, a copy of the memorial from the Department of State to the British Minister Plenipotentiary near the United States; and 4th, a letter from the President to his Britannic Majesty, indicating the functions which you are destined to fulfill.

At the earliest possible moment after your arrival in London you will communicate to the proper persons belonging to the British Ministry your mission as stated in the memorial, and request that the conferences necessary to its conclusion may be expedited.

When you shall come into conference you will declare that you are possessed of the ratification, as was promised in the memorial, but that you are instructed to inquire into the existence of a late order, said to be issued under the authority of his Britannic Majesty, for the seizure of the provision vessels even of neutral nations. If the order does not exist, or, existing, does not operate on the vessels of the United States, you will proceed to accomplish the exchange of ratifications as is hereinafter mentioned. If this order does exist, and does operate on the vessels of the United States, you will make such representations as that order shall suggest relative to the interests and situation of the United States, to the end that it may be removed; and, particularly, that the ratification of the President must not be construed into an admission of the legality of the said order. Minute instructions cannot now be given concerning that order, as our accounts of it are very imperfect. But if, after every prudent effort, you find that it cannot be removed, its continuance is not to be an obstacle to the exchange of ratifications.

No. 207.

Mr. Pickering, Acting Secretary of State, to Mr. J. Q. Adams, Minister of the United States at the Hague, dated Department of State, August 25, 1795.

SIR: The President of the United States having ratified, with the advice and consent of the Senate, the treaty of amity, commerce, and navigation, concluded and signed between the Plenipotentiaries of the United States of America and his Britannic Majesty, at London, on the 19th day of November, 1794, he has thought proper to authorize you to take the necessary measures for the exchange of ratifications. On the credit and authority of this letter, therefore, you may proceed to the exchange of ratifications.

This letter will be directed to be opened by William Allen Deas, if you do not arrive in London by the 20th day of October, 1795. In that case he will, by virtue of this letter, possess the same authority for exchanging the ratifications as is hereby given to you, and will continue to exercise it until the business is accomplished, unless you shall afterwards arrive, and think it advisable to take it into your own hands, notwithstanding it may have been begun. So, also, if Mr. Pinckney should return before the affair is settled, he, as our minister in ordinary in London, will be entitled to assume the management of it, if he chooses to do so.

This letter will be shown, and a copy of it may be given to those of his Britannic Majesty's ministers to whom it may appertain.

I am, very respectfully, sir, your obedient servant,

TIMOTHY PICKERING.

Secretary of State to Mr. Bond, British Chargé d'Affaires in the United States, dated Department of State, September 5, 1795.

SIR: A letter received yesterday from the Attorney of the District of Pennsylvania, intimating a defect of evidence against the present captain of the armed ship Cassius, leads me to inquire whether you are possessed of any to support a charge against him as having been concerned in originally fitting her out, or entering on board her, either in the United States, or going from the States with an intention of entering on board her, contrary to law. If you have, or can obtain such evidence, you will greatly oblige me by communicating it.

I am, sir, with great consideration, your most obedient servant,

Mr. Pickering, Acting Secretary of State, to John Quincy Adams, Esq., or William Allen Deas, Esq., dated Department of State, September 12, 1795.

[Extract.]

"To the complaint of Captain Home's outrages I have to add one against the commander of the Hermione frigate, who, on the 4th of July, 1795, came down from Port-au-Prince to Jamaica, on the island of Hispaniola, and there stripped upwards of twenty American vessels of their crews, impressing all the men, excepting the captains and mates. The deposition of Captain Cyprian Cook and of Elijah Clark, his passenger, herewith transmitted, will give you the particulars of this violence. The cruelty and brutality of that British naval officer are sufficiently marked in the deposition.

"If Britain studied to keep up the irritation in the minds of Americans, and wished to prevent the return of our good will, some of her naval commanders appear perfectly qualified for the object. But we believe she has very different views. We consider such proceedings as obnoxious to her government, as they are injurious to us. To vindicate, however, the honor of that Government, justice must be done; our seamen should recover more than their liberty; liberal damages should be awarded them, and such naval officers receive exemplary punishment. Further, to prevent a repetition of such atrocious acts more pointed orders must be given, and the consequences to those who violate them rendered severe and certain.

"This evil is of such magnitude, and so frequently occurring, Great Britain ought, for her own sake, to agree to some regulation calculated effectually to protect our seamen, if the return of our friendship and its good consequences be really objects worth obtaining, or if justice and humanity constitute parts of her character."

DEAR SIR: I am sorry I did not think to ask of you the precise result of the question agitated before you at Charleston and Columbia, relative to the sale of prizes taken by a French privateer from the British. I presume your decision was, that the sales should not be made; it appearing that the permission of such sales would be a violation of the 24th article of our treaty with Great Britain. The principal difficulty which has occurred here, on my inquiries, respects the mode of proceeding to prevent the sales. You ordered an injunction to stay the sales in Charleston. May Judge Cushing do the same at Boston with regard to the prizes lately carried in there? Can the District Judge do the same? Trusting that you have fully made up your mind on this subject, I beg the favor of you to communicate it immediately to Judge Lowell at Boston, to whom I have written on this occasion, and, at your leisure, to indulge me with an answer, particularly as circular instructions may be proper to be transmitted to all the District Judges and Attorneys, as well as to the Collectors of the Customs.

No. 228.

Secretary of State to Harrison Gray Otis, District Attorney of the United States, dated Department of State, July 12, 1796.

SIR: I received your letter of the 6th. Since I wrote you on the 30th ultimo, orders have been issued from the Treasury Department to the Collectors not to admit to an entry any prizes taken by foreign privateers, commissioned by any Prince or State at enmity with Great Britain.

I trust the Chief Justice, Ellsworth, will have written to Judge Lowell on this subject, agreeably to my request on the 30th ultimo, the question having been considered, and, I take it, determined by him in South Carolina.

By an act of Congress, (being in addition to the act entitled "An act to establish the Judicial Courts of the United States,") passed the 2d of March, 1793, any Judge of the Supreme Court may grant an injunction in cases where it might be granted by the Supreme or a Circuit Court. Judge Ellsworth's expected statement, I trust, will show that Judge Cushing may proceed in Massachusetts as he did in South Carolina. The British Consul, I think, omitted an act of duty, in not making the remonstrance against the sales of the prizes, or the entry of them, as you proposed, unless there were on the spot agents of the owners of the vessels and cargoes, on whom that duty would be incumbent.

If no formal injunction should be obtained to prevent the sales, the agents of the captors may, I presume, be properly informed that the sales will be unlawful, and that they will subject themselves, if they proceed to sell the prizes, to indictment and punishment, for a violation of a supreme law of the United States. In one way or the other I hope we shall be able to escape the charge of infringing a treaty; or, if the sales of any of the prizes should take place, that the United States will be justified by a rigorous prosecution of the agents. The Attorney General is absent from the seat of Government, or I would have requested his advice on this occasion.

I am, sir, with great respect your obedient servant,

TIMOTHY PICKERING.

Extract of a report from Mr. Pickering, Secretary of State, to the President of the United States, dated Department of State, July 15, 1796.

"Mr. Adet asks whether the President has caused orders to be given to prevent the sale of prizes conducted into the ports of the United States by vessels of the Republic, or privateers armed under its authority. On this, I have the honor to inform you that the 24th article of the British treaty having explicitly forbidden the arming of privateers, and the selling of their prizes in the ports of the United States, the Secretary of the Treasury prepared, as a matter of course, circular letters to the Collectors, to conform to the restrictions contained in that article as the law of the land. This was the more necessary, as formerly the Collectors had been instructed to admit to an entry and sale the prizes brought into our ports."

"Orders having been given to prevent the sale of prizes brought into our ports by French privateers, conformably to the 24th article of our treaty with Great Britain, a certain class of our citizens raised some little clamor, that the prohibition was not only unfriendly to France, but a violation of our treaty with that nation."

"We cannot let the present opportunity pass without requesting you to state to your Government how useful it would be to the interests of the inhabitants of the two Republics that the United States should at last seriously take to heart the numberless insults daily committed on their flag by the English—to represent to them, that when circumstances oblige our commerce to confide its interests to the neutral flag of American vessels, it has a just right to insist that that flag be protected with energy, and that it be not insulted at the expense of a friendly and allied nation. Deign to recall to the remembrance of the nation of which you are minister that the numerous services which our Republic has rendered to it, our reciprocal relations, as well as mutual utility, imperiously require that it should cease to view with indifference the manner in which the English act; who carry off with impunity from on board American vessels the property of Batavians. Lead them to perceive that reasons of convenience, treaties concluded subsequent to that with the Batavian Republic, cannot change or annul a treaty formally concluded and ratified between our two nations—between two nations who have equally suffered from the arrogance and despotism on the seas of proud Albion—in a word, between two nations who, making common cause with the French Republic, and governing themselves by the imprescriptible rights of nature and of men, may render to the two hemispheres a peace for which humanity languishes."

No. 233.

Secretary of State to Mr. King, Minister of the United States to Great Britain, dated Department of State, November 26, 1796.

DEAR SIR: On the 14th instant I enclosed you copies of a note from Mr. Adet, and of my answer. He has since addressed to me another note, in which he has enumerated the complaints of the Executive

Directory of the French Republic against the Government of the United States. Among the grounds of complaint, the commercial treaty with Great Britain holds a distinguished place, and is assigned as the direct cause of the orders of the Directory to Mr. Adet to suspend his ministerial functions with the Federal Government. This last long note, as well as the former, with my answer, has been published in a pamphlet, which I now enclose. To you, who have been a member of the Government, and are actually acquainted with all its transactions in relation to France, no illustration is necessary to convince you how groundless are the complaints exhibited by Mr. Adet, or how repugnant to principle and to treaty are the measures resolved on by the Directory respecting our commerce; you will see that I endeavor to obtain an explanation of the decree of the Directory, but instead of an explanation, Mr. Adet is pleased to tell me that I appear not to have understood either his note or the decree of the Directory respecting our commerce. He adds, indeed, that the Directory mean, by their decree, to set aside the rule mutually stipulated by our two nations, that free ships shall make free goods, and to add to the list of contraband articles, in equal violation of our treaty; but the object of my inquiry was to ascertain whether, in the actual state of things, our commerce was to be exposed to the vexations which might, by the men-of-war and privateers, be imagined to be warranted by the general terms of the decree. You will observe that your information from Mr. Monroe, and letter to our Consul, Mr. Johnson, founded thereon, contributed to increase the doubts excited by the tenor of the decree itself. The subsequent words of Mr. Adet increase our embarrassment; for our treaty with France is not simply to be violated in the two instances just mentioned, but we are to be exposed to "reprisals for all vexations, contrary to the law of nations and to the treaties, which the Americans shall endure on the part of the English without an efficacious opposition." And what opposition will the Directory deem efficacious, short of war with Great Britain? What other opposition can we make, seeing that a compliance with the views of the Directory would oblige us to require of Great Britain a voluntary relinquishment of her acknowledged rights under the laws of nations? If the decree is executed, we shall, in truth, suffer unexampled vexation; for the French armed ships and privateers will have no guide but their opinions of the cases of capture and kind of vexations we endure from the British. And then, in the final event, if circumstances shall incline the Directory to recur to principles and the stipulations of treaties, it will be said, in answer to our complaints, that their armed vessels have misconstrued their decree, as the British armed vessels mistook the orders of the 6th of November, 1793, to carry our vessels into their ports for adjudication.

The articles of our produce are now generally so much lower in France than in the United States, our commerce with that country is reduced to a small scale; the opportunities of corresponding directly with our minister at Paris will, therefore, not often occur; so that it will be in your power to communicate earlier advices of what is passing in France than we can expect from Mr. Pinckney. I must entreat you to advert to this circumstance, and that to a recital of facts you would add such reflections as a nearer view of them shall suggest.

I commit to your care a letter for Gouverneur Morris, Esq., to be delivered when he returns to England, for we hear he is on the continent.

With great respect and esteem, sir,

TIMOTHY PICKERING.

"While, in our external relations, some serious inconveniences and embarrassments have been overcome, and others lessened, it is with much pain and deep regret I mention that circumstances of a very unwelcome nature have lately occurred. Our trade has suffered and is suffering extensive injuries in the West Indies from the cruisers and agents of the French Republic; and communications have been received from its minister here which indicate the danger of a further disturbance of our commerce by its authority, and which are in other respects far from agreeable."

Message to the Council of Five Hundred, of the 15th Nivose, 6th year, (January 4, 1798.)

[Translation.]

CITIZENS REPRESENTATIVES: On this day, the 15th of Nivose, and at the very hour at which the Executive Directory addresses this message to you, the municipal administrators, the justices of the peace, the commissaries of the directory, and the superintendents of the customs, are proceeding, in all the chief places of the departments, in all the ports, and in all the principal communes of the Republic, to seize the English merchandise now in France, or introduced into its territory in contravention of the law of the 10th of Brumaire, 5th year, (October 31, 1796.)

Such is the first act by which, now that peace is given to the continent, the war declared long since against England is about to assume the real character which becomes it. The French will not suffer a power which seeks to found its prosperity upon the misfortunes of other nations to raise its commerce upon the ruin of that of other States, and which, aspiring to the dominion of the seas, wishes to introduce everywhere the articles of its own manufacture, and to receive nothing from foreign industry, any longer to enjoy the fruit of guilty speculations.

The English Government has kept in pay, during the war, the coalesced forces with the produce of its manufactures. It has violated all the principles of the law of nations, in order to shackle the relations of neutral powers; it has caused to be seized the provisions, corn, and commodities, which it supposed to be destined for France; it has declared contraband everything which it thought could be useful to the Republic. It desired to starve it. All the citizens call for vengeance.

When it had to fear the capture of vessels sailing under its flag, it corrupted foreign captains to induce them to take on board their vessels English merchandise, and thus to introduce it by stratagem, by fraud, or otherwise, into other States, and especially into the French Republic.

The neutral powers should have perceived that by this conduct their merchants took part in the war, and that they lent assistance to one of the belligerent powers.

We serve a party as well when we procure for it the means of augmenting its forces as when we unite ourselves to those which it has. The neutral powers should have perceived that England, by stopping the vessels of other powers laden in their respective ports and destined for France, by permitting articles coming from her own manufactories alone to circulate, aimed at an exclusive commerce, and that it would be necessary to seek reparation for such an attempt.

The ordinance of the marine and the regulation of 1704 have declared lawful prize the vessels and their cargoes, in which is found English merchandise, belonging to enemies. These provisions should be extended. The interest of Europe requires it.

The Directory thinks it urgent and necessary to pass a law declaring that the character of vessels, relative to their quality of neutral or enemy, shall be determined by their cargo, and the cargo shall be no longer covered by the flag: in consequence, that every vessel found at sea, having on board English provisions and merchandise as her cargo, in whole or in part, shall be declared lawful prize, whosoever may be the proprietor of these provisions or merchandise, which shall be reputed contraband, for this cause alone that they came from England or her possessions.

It would be useful to declare at the same time that, except in the case of distress, the ports of the Republic shall be shut to all foreign vessels which, in the course of their voyages, shall have entered those of England.

The Executive Directory requests you, citizens representatives, to adopt these measures. No neutral or allied power can mistake their object, nor complain of them, unless it be already abandoned to England. The infallible effect of the measure is to enhance the value of the produce of their own soil and industry, to increase the prosperity of their commerce, to repel everything that comes from England, and essentially to influence the conclusion of the war.

Such are the motives which induce the Executive Directory to invite you, citizen representatives, to take the object of this message into the most prompt consideration.

Law relative to vessels laden with English merchandise, of the 29*th Nivose,* 6*th year, (January* 18, 1798.)

The Council of Ancients, adopting the reasons for the declaration of urgency which precedes the resolution hereinafter contained, approves the act of urgency. Here follows the tenor of the declaration of urgency and of the resolution of the 22d Nivose, (January 11, 1798.) The Council of Five Hundred, after having heard the report of a special committee upon the message of the Executive Directory, of the 15th Nivose, (January 4,) relative to the English merchandise, considering that the interest of the Republic demands the most prompt measures against all vessels which may be loaded therewith, declares that there is urgency.

The Council having declared the urgency, resolves as follows:

ARTICLE 1. The character of vessels, relative to their quality of neuter or enemy, shall be determined by their cargo; in consequence, every vessel found at sea loaded in whole or in part with merchandise the production of England or her possessions shall be declared good prize, whoever the owner of these goods or merchandise may be.

ARTICLE 2. Every foreign vessel which, in the course of her voyage, shall have entered into an English port, shall not be admitted into a port of the French Republic except in case of necessity; in which case she shall be bound to depart from the said port as soon as the causes of her entry shall have ceased.

ARTICLE 3. The present resolution shall be printed.

Extract from the registers of the deliberations of the Executive Directory.

PARIS, the 13*th Thermidor,* 6*th year of the French Republic, (July* 31, 1798.)

The Executive Directory, having heard the report of the Minister of Marine and the Colonies;

Considering that information recently received from the French colonies and the continent of America leave no room to doubt that French cruisers, or such as call themselves French, have infringed the laws of the Republic relative to cruising and prizes;

Considering that foreigners and pirates have abused the latitude allowed at Cayenne and in the West India Islands to vessels fitted out for cruising or for war and commerce, in order to cover with the French flag their extortions, and the violation of the respect due to the law of nations and to the persons and property of allies and neutrals,

DECREES.

ARTICLE 1. Hereafter no letters of marque, authorizations, or permissions to fit out vessels either for cruising or for war and commerce, shall be issued in the colonies of America but by special agents of the Directory themselves, who shall not delegate that power to any one. They shall exercise it only in favor of owners of vessels whose principles and responsibility are well known to them; and they shall be bound to conform themselves to all the laws relative to cruising and prizes, and especially to those of the 1st October, 1793, (O. S.)

ARTICLE 2. All letters of marque, authorizations, or permissions, granted in the colonies of America by the particular agents of the Executive Directory, and all other agents, civil and military, under their orders, to fit out vessels either for cruising or for war and commerce, shall be considered as not having been done after the thirtieth day from the publication of the present decree in the said colonies.

ARTICLE 3. All agents and other deputies in the neutral possessions, appointed to decide there upon the validity of prizes taken by the French cruisers, and who shall be suspected of having a direct or indirect interest in the vessels fitted out for cruising or for war and commerce, shall be immediately recalled.

ARTICLE 4. The special agents of the Executive Directory at Cayenne, Saint Domingo, and Guadaloupe, shall studiously take care that the interests and property of vessels belonging to neutrals or allies be scrupulously respected; and they shall in no case bargain for their cargoes but by mutual consent, and to the full and entire satisfaction of the contracting parties.

ARTICLE 5. The said special agents of the Executive Directory, the commanders of all vessels of the Republic, the consuls, vice consuls, and all others invested with powers for that purpose, shall cause to be arrested and punished, conformably to the laws, all those who shall contravene the provisions of the present decree, which shall be printed in the bulletin of the laws, and with the execution of which the Ministers of Foreign Relations, and of the Marine, and of the Colonies, are charged.

Copy of a decree. Extract from the register of the decrees of the Executive Directory, of the 29th Thermidor, 6th year of the French Republic, (August 16, 1798.)

The Executive Directory, considering that notwithstanding the hostile manifestations of the Government of the United States, which have occasioned a momentary embargo upon their vessels, it must be believed that, unless abandoned to the passions of the British cabinet, that Government, faithful to the interests of the American nation, will take measures conformable to the pacific dispositions of the French Republic after it shall receive a confirmation of them;

And wishing to pursue the friendly and fraternal habits of France towards a people whose liberty it defended, decrees as follows:

ARTICLE 1. The embargo laid upon the American vessels shall be immediately raised.

ARTICLE 2. The Minister of Marine and of the Colonies is charged with the execution of the present decree, which shall not be printed.

Decree of the Executive Directory, in explanation of that of the 12th Ventose, 5th year, (March 2, 1797,) concerning the navigation of neutral vessels, of the 28th Ventose, 7th year, (March 18, 1799.)

The Executive Directory, having examined its decree of the 12th Ventose, 5th year, (March 2, 1797,) concerning the navigation of neutral vessels loaded with merchandise belonging to the enemies of the Republic, and the judgment on the trials as to the validity of maritime prizes, considering that the 4th article of that decree, in what relates to the rôles d'équipages with which neutral vessels ought to be furnished, has had improper interpretations so far as concerns the rôles d'équipages of American vessels, and that it is time to do away the obstacles resulting therefrom to the navigation of the vessels of that nation.

After having heard the Minister of Exterior Relations and the Minister of Justice declare that, by the fourth article of said decree it was not understood that the navigation of American vessels, relatively to the form of their rôles d'équipages, was subjected to other conditions than those imposed on all neutrals by the 12th article of the ordinance of 1794, and by the 9th article of that of the 26th of July, 1778.

The Ministers of the Marine and of Justice, each in what concerns him, are charged with the execution of the present decree, which shall be inserted in the bulletin of laws.

Decree of the Executive Directory as to those who compose the crews of the vessels of the enemies of France, (8th Brumaire, 7th year, October 29, 1799.)

[Translation.]

The Executive Directory, on the report of the Minister of Exterior Relations, considering that the squadrons, privateers, and vessels of England and Russia, are in part manned by foreigners; considering that this violation is a manifest abuse of the law of nations, and that the powers of Europe have not taken any measures to stop it—decree:

ARTICLE 1. Every person, native (original) of friendly countries, allied to the French Republic, or neutral, holding a commission given by the enemies of France, or making part of the crews of the vessels of war, or other enemy vessels, shall, for that act alone, be declared a pirate, and treated as such, without being allowed, in any case, to allege that he was forced by violence, menace, or otherwise.

ARTICLE 2. The Executive Directory of the Batavian, Ligurian, Cisalpine, and Roman Republics, shall be informed of this measure.

ARTICLE 3. The provisions contained in the first article shall be notified to the powers neutral or allied to the French Republic.

[Translation.]

ARTICLE 1. In execution of the 3d article of the decree of the Executive Directory of the 8th of this month, the allied or neutral powers shall be invited to take the necessary measures for recalling within a time, which shall be fixed, those mariners of their respective nations actually embarked on board the vessels-of-war or other vessels belonging to England.

ARTICLE 2. The Ambassadors, Ministers, and Envoys of the Republic, near the respective powers, shall receive particular instructions on this subject.

Decree of the Consuls of the Republic, which puts in force the ordinance of the 26th of July, 1778, concerning the navigation of neutral vessels, 29th Frimaire, 8th year, December 19, 1800.

The Consuls having examined the law of the 23d Frimaire, 8th year, December 13, 1800, which repeals the first article of the law of the 25th Nivose, 6th year, January 14, 1798, relative to maritime cruising; considering that the repeal of that law necessarily renews that state of the law antecedently existing.

That this, as fixed by the ordinance of the 26th July, 1778, is considered the most proper to conciliate the interests of the Republic with the rights of neutral powers; wishing to prevent, on the part of French or neutral owners, (armateur,) errors or interpretations which shall counteract the views under which the law of the 29th Nivose, 6th year, January 18, 1798, has been repealed—decree what follows:

ARTICLE 1. The regulations prescribed by the ordinance of the 26th July, 1778, concerning the navigation of neutral vessels, shall be strictly observed by all those to whom they shall be applicable; but, in case of a contravention on their part, they are to suffer the confiscations and condemnations, in damages, fixed on by the said ordinance and the laws.

ARTICLE 2. The Ministers of Justice, of the Marine, of Exterior Relations, and of the Finances, are charged, each one in what concerns him, with the execution of the present decree, which shall be inserted in the bulletin of the laws.

DECREE.

The Special Agents of the Executive Directory to the Windward Islands:

Considering that the ports of the Windward and Leeward Islands, as well as those of Demarara, Essequibo, and Berbice, delivered up to the English, occupied and defended by emigrants, are in a state of regular siege, and not entitled to the same advantages as the ports of the different English colonies, possessed by that power before the war, or to other rights;

Considering that it is against every principle to treat a horde of insurgents, destitute of country, without Government, and without a flag, with the same respect as civilized nations preserve towards each other during a war;

Considering that, by the authentic acts which are in our possession, it is proved that the divers places of the colonies, delivered up to the English by the rebel Frenchmen and Batavians, no more belong to the British Government than la Vendee, in which the English ministry had, in like manner, mercenary troops under pay—some regiments clad in the same uniform as those of England;

Considering that, in virtue of the second article of the treaty of alliance, concluded at Paris on the 6th of February, 1778, between the United States and France, the former power engaged to defend the American possessions in case of war, and that the Government and the commerce of the United States have strangely abused the forbearance of the Republic of France, in turning to its injury the favors granted to them of trading in all the ports of the French colonies;

That by permitting neutral vessels any longer to carry provisions of war and of subsistence to men evidently in a state of rebellion would be to prolong civil war, and the calamities and crimes flowing therefrom—decree as follows:

ARTICLE 1. The ships of the Republic and French privateers are authorized to capture, and conduct into the ports of the Republic, neutral vessels destined to the Windward and Leeward Islands of America delivered up to the English, and occupied and defended by the emigrants. These ports are Martinico, St. Lucia, Tobago, Demarara, Berbice, Essequibo, and at the Leeward, Port au Prince, St. Mark's, L'Archaye, and Jeremie.

ARTICLE 2. Every armed vessel, having a commission from either of the said ports, shall be reputed a pirate, and the crews adjudged and punished as such.

ARTICLE 3. The vessels and cargoes described in the first and second articles are declared good prize, and shall be sold for the benefit of the captors.

ARTICLE 4. Every captured vessel which shall have cleared out under the vague denomination of West Indies, is comprehended in the first and second articles.

ARTICLE 5. The decree of the 4th of last Nivose, in pursuance of the resolution of the Executive Directory, of the 14th Messidor, 4th year, shall be executed, until further orders, as far as shall not be contravened by the present decree.

This decree shall be printed, transcribed in the register of the criminal and commercial tribunals, sent to all the French colonial ports, read, published, and posted up wherever it may be necessary.

It shall be notified officially to the neutral Governments of St. Croix, St. Thomas, and St. Bartholomew's.

Enjoining the criminal and commercial tribunals of Guadaloupe, their delegates in the different French colonies and elsewhere, the Rear-Admiral commandant on the West India station, and the head of the administration, to aid in executing the present decree, each in his respective department.

EQUALITY. LIBERTY.

Extract from the Register of the Special Agency of the Executive Directory to the Windward Islands.

The special agents of the Executive Directory to the Windward Islands:

Considering that the laws, as well ancient as modern, forbid neutrals to carry to the enemy contraband or prohibited merchandises:

Considering that notwithstanding the complaints of the Minister Plenipotentiary of the French Republic near the United States of North America, of which he has informed us by his letter of the 2d of July, 1796, those States, and especially Virginia, have fitted out vessels loaded with horses for the English:

Decree, that from this day forward all vessels loaded with merchandises designated by the name of contraband, as arms, instruments, munitions of war, of what kind soever, horses and their furniture, shall be stopped by the ships of war and privateers, to be seized and confiscated for the benefit of the captors.

Instructions to the commanders of our ships-of-war and privateers that have or may have letters of marque against France.

Given at our Court at St. James, the 8th day of January, 1794.

Whereas by our former instructions to the commanders of our ships-of-war and privateers, dated the 6th day of November, 1793, we signified that they should stop and detain all ships laden with goods the produce of any colony belonging to France, or carrying provisions or other supplies for the use of any such colony, and should bring the same with their cargoes to legal adjudication. We are pleased to revoke the said instruction, and in lieu thereof we have thought fit to issue these our instructions, to be duly observed by the commanders of all our ships-of-war and privateers that have or may have letters of marque against France:

1st. That they shall bring in for lawful adjudication all vessels, with their cargoes, that are laden with goods the produce of the French West India islands, and coming directly from any port of the said islands to any port in Europe.

2d. That they shall bring in for lawful adjudication all ships, with their cargoes, that are laden with goods the produce of the said islands, the property of which goods shall belong to subjects of France, to whatsoever ports the same may be bound.

3d. That they shall seize all ships that shall be found attempting to enter any port of the said islands that is or shall be blockaded by the arms of his Majesty or his allies, and shall send them, in, with their cargoes, for adjudication, according to the terms of the second article of the former instructions, bearing date the 8th day of June, 1793.

4th. That they shall seize all vessels laden wholly or in part with naval or military stores, bound to any port of the said islands, and shall send them into some convenient port belonging to his Majesty in order that they, together with their cargoes, may be proceeded against according to the rules of nations.

SIR: The several French West India islands are to be considered as under blockade from the arrival of the armament at Barbadoes, the 6th of January; therefore all neutral vessels trading with these islands within that period are clearly intended to come within the King's order in council, dated the 6th of November, 1793.

Instructions to the commanders of all ships-of-war and privateers that have or may have letters of marque against France. August 18, 1794.

GEORGE R.

Whereas by an article of our instructions to the commanders of our ships-of-war and privateers having letters of marque against France, given at our court at St. James, the 8th day of June, 1793, we thought fit to declare that it should be lawful to stop and detain all ships laden wholly or in part with corn, flour, or meal, bound to any port in France, or any port occupied by the armies of France, and to send them to such ports as should be most convenient, in order that such corn, meal, or flour, might be purchased on behalf of our Government, and the ships be released after such purchase, and after a due allowance for freight, or that the masters of such ships, on giving due security, to be approved by our Court of Admiralty, should be permitted to dispose of their cargoes of corn, meal, or flour, in the ports of any power in amity with us:

We, not judging it expedient to continue for the present the purchase of the said cargoes on behalf of our Government, are pleased to revoke the said article until our further order therein, and to declare that the same shall no longer remain in force. But we strictly enjoin all our commanders of our ships-of-war and privateers to observe the remaining articles of the said instructions, and likewise all other instructions which we have issued and which still continue in force.

Letter from Captain Nelson to the American and Danish Consuls at Cadiz.

HIS BRITANNIC MAJESTY'S SHIP CAPTAIN, off Cadiz, April 11, 1797.

SIR: In consequence of the unprovoked declaration of war by the King of Spain against his Britannic Majesty and the British nation, it is thought right that Spain should no longer have any trade. I have therefore the honor to acquaint you that no neutral vessel will be permitted in future to enter or leave the port of Cadiz unless by leave obtained from me or the commander-in-chief of the British fleet, and that from this moment Cadiz is to be considered as a blockaded port.

I have the honor, &c., &c.,

Instructions to the commanders of our ships-of-war and privateers that have or may have letters of marque against France, Spain, or the United Provinces. Given at our court of St. James, the 25th day of January, 1798, in the 38th year of our reign.

Whereas by our former instructions to the commanders of our ships-of-war and privateers, dated January 8, 1794, we signified that they should bring in for lawful adjudication all vessels, with their cargoes, that were laden with goods the produce of the French West India islands, and coming directly from any port of the said islands to any port in Europe; and likewise all ships, with their cargoes, that were laden with goods the produce of the said islands, the property of which goods shall belong to subjects of France, to whatsoever ports the same might be bound; and that they should seize all ships that should be found attempting to enter any port of the said islands that was or should be blockaded by the arms of his Majesty or his allies, and should send them in, with their cargoes, for adjudication; and also all vessels laden wholly or in part with naval or military stores, bound to any port of the said islands, and should send them into some convenient port belonging to his Majesty, in order that they, together with their cargoes, might be proceeded against according to the law of nations; and whereas, in consideration of the present state of the commerce of this country, as well as of that of neutral countries, it is expedient to revoke the said instructions, we are pleased hereby to revoke the same, and in lieu thereof we have thought fit to issue these, our instructions, to be observed from henceforth by the commanders of all our ships-of-war and privateers that have or may have letters of marque against France, Spain, and the United Provinces:

1st. That they shall bring in for lawful adjudication all vessels, with their cargoes, that are laden with goods the produce of any island or settlement belonging to France, Spain, or the United Provinces, and coming directly from any port of the said islands or settlements to any port in Europe, not being a port of this Kingdom, nor a port of that country, to which such ships, being neutral ships, shall belong.

2d. That they shall bring in for lawful adjudication all ships, with their cargoes, that are laden with goods the produce of the said islands or settlements, the property of which goods shall belong to subjects of France, Spain, or the United Provinces, to whatsoever ports the same may be bound.

3d. That they shall seize all ships that shall be found attempting to enter any port of the said islands or settlements that is or shall be blockaded by the arms of his Majesty, and shall send them in, with their cargoes, for adjudication, according to the terms of the second article of the former instructions, bearing date the 8th day of June, 1793.

4th. That they shall seize all vessels laden wholly or in part with naval or military stores, bound to any port of the said islands or settlements, and shall send them into some convenient port belonging to his Majesty, in order that they, together with their cargoes, may be proceeded against according to the rules of the law of nations.

No. 260.

Extracts of a letter from Mr. Pickering, Secretary of State, to Mr. Pinckney, Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States at Paris, dated Department of State, January 16, 1797.

"The next Executive act noticed by Mr. Adet is the letter of the 4th of August, 1793, written, by the President's command, by the Secretary of the Treasury to the Collectors of Customs, and accompanied by the rules which the President had adopted for preventing all armaments in favor of any of the belligerent powers. These rules were considered as just and necessary deductions from the laws of neutrality established and received among nations. The letter from the Secretary of the Treasury is explanatory of these rules, and, among other instructions, particularly points the Collectors to the 17th and 22d articles of our treaty with France; lest, by inattention or misconception of them, she might be injured and her enemies benefited. The letter concludes with enjoining the Collectors to execute those instructions 'with vigilance, care, activity, and impartiality;' 'because omissions would tend to expose the Government to injurious imputations and suspicions, and proportionably to commit the good faith and peace of the country.' How could such rules, with such reasons to enforce them, not escape censure? They were framed and required to be executed with strict impartiality; and, consequently, were to prevent Frenchmen continuing those aggressions on our sovereignty and neutrality which had been commenced under Mr. Genet's orders, and which were calculated to involve us in a war with Britain, Spain, and Holland; for at that time these were all combined against France. Frenchmen were to have no other preferences than those secured to them by treaty, (except that they were not forbidden to sell their lawful prizes in our ports,) and our own citizens were to be restrained from committing hostilities under the banners of France, as well as those of other powers."

"That we have given the exclusive admission to sell here the prizes made by France on her enemies in the present war, though unstipulated in our treaties, and unfounded in her own practice, or in that of other nations, as we believe.

"To this detail I have to add, that of all the loans and supplies received from France in the American war, amounting to nearly fifty-three millions of livres, the United States, under their late Government, had been enabled to pay not two millions and a half of livres; that the present Government, after paying up the arrearages and instalments mentioned by Mr. Jefferson, has been continually anticipating the subsequent instalments, until, in the year 1795, the whole of our debt to France was discharged by anticipating payments of eleven millions and a half of livres, no part of which would have become due until the second of September, 1796, and then only one million and a half; the residue at subsequent periods; the last not until the year 1802.

"There remains yet various passages of Mr. Adet's notes on which some observations are to be made.

"In my letter of the 1st of November last, in answer to Mr. Adet's note of October 27, in which he communicated the decree of the Executive Directory of the second of July last, declaring that the flag of the Republic of France should treat the flag of neutrals in the same manner as these shall suffer it to be treated by the English, I asked an explanation of the decree, mentioning the circumstances which excited doubts. There seemed to be sufficient cause for inquiry. Had the decree referred to the past captures by the English, our knowledge of them would have been some guide in forming our opinion of the threatened captures by the French; but the operation of the decree was to depend on the future conduct of the English; the French were to treat the flag of neutrals as these shall suffer it to be treated by the English.

As this could not be ascertained beforehand, we wished to know whether the restraints then exercised by the British Government were considered as of a nature to justify a denial of those rights which were pledged to us by our treaty with France? Whether the orders had actually been given to capture the vessels of the United States? And, if given, what were the precise terms of those orders? Mr. Adet, in his reply, says that I appear not to have understood either the decree of the Directory or his note which accompanied it. The meaning of the decree is certainly not very obvious. The manner of executing it was declared to depend on a contingency—the future conduct of the English. How were French cruisers in the four quarters of the world to determine what was the conduct of the English at any given time? If he could have furnished a copy of the orders actually given to French armed vessels, under the decree, we might have seen clearly what were the intentions of the Directory. If we are to take the practice of the French armed vessels and of some of the French tribunals as the true illustration of the decree, Mr. Adet's own explanations will be very defective. He has specified only two cases, the taking of English (or other enemy's) property on board American vessels, and the seizure of all the goods classed as contraband in our treaty with Great Britain. In the case of contraband goods, the seizure of them is lawful only when they are destined to the ports of their enemies; and the contraband goods only are liable to confiscation. But the special agents of the Directory, in the West Indies, order the seizure of all vessels having on board contraband goods, no matter whether destined to an enemy's, or to a neutral, or even to a French port; and when seized, they confiscate not merely the contraband articles but all other goods, and the vessel herself in which they are laden. They also assign in their decrees of confiscation another cause of capture and condemnation—that the American vessel has sailed to or from a port in possession of the English. We are not informed that the English take any neutral vessels from this cause. We have heard of several American vessels being captured and confiscated by the French, merely because they had not a sea letter, when no doubt could have been entertained of the property being American. Yet it is conceived that the want of a sea letter was never intended to exclude other proofs of property.

"Further, ought we to have imagined that the Executive Directory intended to leave it to the discretion of every privateer and of every inferior tribunal to judge what, at any time subsequent to their decree, was the actual treatment received by American vessels from the British? Ought we to have imagined that the decree was formed in such indefinite terms on purpose to give scope for arbitrary constructions, and consequently for unlimited oppression? Ought we to have imagined what Mr. Adet has himself declared to be the meaning of the decree, that the French armed vessels were not to content themselves with capturing American vessels having English property or contraband goods on board, and getting such property and goods condemned by their tribunals; but if any English commanders were to practice 'vexations' towards Americans, that Frenchmen were to do the same? Ought we to have imagined that the Directory intended the citizens of France should be encouraged to take revenge on their friends for the outrages of their enemies? And what is to limit these vexations? If one English commander in a hundred perversely and wantonly abuse his power, is every French officer to become his rival in dishonor? Or if we are to suffer only measure for measure, (and surely the decree goes not beyond this,) who is to designate the every hundredth French officer who is to be the instrument of similar oppression?

"But French armed vessels are to make all these captures in violation of the treaty, and we are to suffer all these vexations in violation of reason and humanity, while we endure them from the English 'without an efficacious opposition!' And what opposition will be deemed efficacious? For all captures made by the British, contrary to the law of nations, we have, agreeably to that law, demanded satisfaction; the British have engaged to make us satisfaction, and commissioners are now sitting to liquidate those demands. What opposition could have been more efficacious? What further opposition can be lawful? Instead of further comments on this subject, let me present to you some passages in Mr. Adet's letter of the 14th of July, 1795. In this letter he communicated to the Secretary of State the decree of the Committee of Public Safety of the 3d* of January, 1795, repealing the 5th article of the decree of the 15th† of November, 1794. The latter violated our treaty by subjecting the property of the enemies of France on board American vessels to capture, and by adding to the list of articles contraband; it was, therefore, repealed by the former. Mr. Adet seized this occasion to make the following declaration: 'You will see, sir, (said he) in both [the decrees] the undisguised disposition and sincere desire of the French Government religiously to observe the engagements it has contracted with its allies, and its readiness to redress infractions which have never taken place but from the impulse of circumstances.' 'It is amidst her triumphs that the Republic loves to give this striking mark of its fidelity. Victorious France knows no other concern than that of justice, no other diplomatic language than that of truth' To this truth, to this justice, to this fidelity, we now make our appeal.

"From the style of Mr. Adet's complaint of the British being suffered to arm in our ports, it might be imagined the instances were numerous. None were permitted; the actual armaments were few, and are as old as the year 1793, and were represented by Mr. Genet to the Secretary of State. 'What answer (asked Mr. Adet) did the Government give to the representations of the minister of the French Republic in this respect? It said that these vessels sailed too suddenly; that it was not able to cause them to be stopped.' The answer was given by the Secretary of State in different words. ‡'Those from Charleston and Philadelphia have gone off before it was known to the Government, and the, former indeed, in the first moments of the war, and before preventive measures could be taken in so distant a port.' In the case of the Trusty, Captain Hale, at Baltimore, the Governor of Maryland having been informed that she had been buying guns, had given orders to examine the fact, 'but she got off before the officer could get on board, having cleared out three or four days before.' I have not observed that Mr. Genet ever renewed his complaint with regard to any of these vessels; whence I suppose he was satisfied with the answer, as indeed he ought to have been. The two English vessels that sailed from Philadelphia escaped even the vigilance of the French Consul;‖ both had departed many days before he had been informed of them. This is stated by the Consul himself, in his report of the 21st of June, 1793, to Mr. Genet, and yet the Government is now charged by Mr. Adet with violating the treaty, because it did not stop them! Although the officers of the United States had been required to be watchful, and to report all illegal armaments in our ports, yet it was natural for the Government to expect to derive information from the French Consuls, who doubtless were charged by their own Government to be particularly vigilant in regard to all attempts at such armaments by the enemies of the Republic. Mr. Adet remarks that 'some inhabitants of the United States had aided in these illegal armaments' of the enemies of France; and asks 'what measures were taken against them? Was any search made to discover them—to prosecute them? Never. Yet the very letter from Mr. Genet to the Secretary of State, in which, and its enclosures, Mr. Adet has found this subject of complaint, suggests a different conclusion. * 'I learn with pleasure (says Mr. Genet) by your letter of the 23d of this month [June, 1793] that the Government of Georgia have caused to be stopped a vessel armed in that State for the purpose of cruising against the French, and that the persons interested in this vessel will be prosecuted.

"I shall say but a few words on the subject of the letters of which Mr. Adet complained that they remained unanswered. The first (of September 28, 1795) contained those reproachful insinuations which were recited in my letter of the 1st of November last. Why were these introduced by him if they were not to be applied? An answer was draughted on the subject of his letter, with animadversions on those insinuations; but desiring to avoid irritations, the answer was not sent. It was deemed of the less consequence, seeing in my letter to Mr. Monroe of the 12th of September, 1795, the sentiments and reasonings of the Government on that and other subjects relating to France had been fully expressed, to enable him to make immediate communications to the French Government itself; and it was hoped that the information given in that letter and in others written to him the preceding summer would have furnished materials (and that these materials would have been timely used) for such representations as would have satisfied the French Government that the United States, in forming the treaty with Great Britain, had only exercised an indisputable right and neither by that treaty nor any other act had infringed a single article of our treaties with France.

"On the subject of the impresses of our seamen, mentioned in Mr. Adet's letters of March and April, 1796, I shall only add that nothing was more notorious than that those impresses had excited universal resentment in the United States, and been the subject of repeated remonstrance from our Government to the British court. Thus in Mr. Pinckney's note to Lord Grenville, in August, 1793, which was published here that year in the same collection of State Papers with Mr. Jefferson's letter of September †7th, which Mr. Adet has quoted, and on the 5th page next succeeding it we find the following: 'Under this head it may be observed that for want of arrangements being made for the security of American seamen in the ports of this country, (England,) they are subject to the various hardships Mr. Pinckney has so frequently detailed to Lord Grenville.' And in the next page, in his letter to Mr. Jefferson, Mr. Pinckney says, 'the protection afforded our seamen remains also on the same footing; they (the British Government) profess a willingness to secure to us all real American seamen when proved to be such, but the proof they will not dispense with.' To remove, as far as possible, the embarrassments arising from this cause, and more effectually to protect our seamen, was the object of a bill pending in Congress, and the subject of public debate at the time I received Mr. Adet's letters. This bill was passed into a law. All these acts demonstrated that the Government did not assent, but, on the contrary, that they resisted the impressment of American seamen, and this resistance has been continued; consequently, we cannot be charged on this ground with a violation of our neutrality.

"Among the former subjects of complaint, not now renewed by Mr. Adet, is that against the Government for permitting the purchase and exportation of horses by British agents in the course of the last winter and spring. The correspondence on this subject is lengthy, and yet the question lies within a very narrow compass.

"Perhaps no rule is now better established than that neutral nations have a right to trade freely with nations at war, either by carrying and selling to them all kinds of merchandise, or permitting them to come and purchase the same commodities in the neutral territory—in the latter case not refusing to one power at war what it permits another to purchase; with this exception, in respect to articles contraband, that if the cruisers of one of the belligerent powers meet at sea with neutral vessels laden with such articles destined to the ports of their enemies, the neutral vessels may be captured, and the contraband goods will be lawful prize to the captors, but the residue of their cargo and vessels themselves are to be discharged.

"But if there is any doubt on this point under the law of nations, there can be none in relation to France and the United States, because the matter is specially regulated by their treaty of commerce. This treaty, so far from restraining the trade of either party remaining neutral while the other is engaged in war, provides regulations agreeably to which it should be conducted.

"The 12th and 13th articles authorize either party that is at war to stop the neutral merchant vessels of the other, destined to the ports of an enemy, upon just grounds of suspicion concerning the voyage or the lading. If, on examining the ship's papers, it appears there are any contraband goods on board, 'consigned to a port under the obedience of his enemy,' she may be carried into port, and the contraband articles may, by regular proceedings in the admiralty, be confiscated, 'saving, always, as well the ship itself as any other goods found therein, which, by this treaty, are to be esteemed free; neither may they be detained on pretence of their being, as it were, infected by the prohibited goods; much less shall they be confiscated as lawful prize.' It further provides that if the master of the neutral ship shall be willing to deliver the contraband goods to the captor, and the latter receives them, then is the neutral ship to be forthwith discharged and allowed freely to prosecute her voyage. The 23d article goes further: if the neutral ship shall have on board the enemies of the other, 'they are not to be taken out unless they are soldiers in actual service.'

"These articles are so explicit, it may seem strange that a doubt should arise concerning them; I presume no doubt did arise, for Mr. Adet, overlooking these provisions of the treaty, demanded that the Government should stop the exportation of horses by the British, upon the principle that it was a neutral duty required by the law of nations. An answer was given to his demands, in which the regulations of our treaty with France were particularly brought into view, as well as the rules of the law of nations. Mr. Adet, however, after some time renewed his claims, but again kept the treaty out of sight. An answer was given to these renewed claims, and we heard no more on the subject until the French privateers, in the West Indies began to capture American vessels which had horses on board. You will find among the documents on this subject the copy of a decree of the citizens Victor Hughes and Lebas, the special agents of the Executive Directory in the Windward Islands, condemning an American vessel and her entire cargo for having a small number of horses on board, not bound to their enemies, but to a neutral port. And these special agents ground their decree on the advice they received from Mr. Adet under the date of 14th Messidor, being July 2, 1796. This vessel and cargo were thus condemned without the sight of a single paper belonging to her, the master had them in his pocket, and would have brought them home but for the recollection of the interpreter some hours after the sentence of condemnation had been passed. These citizens exercise, indeed, a very brief authority. The process in the case of a second American vessel which, to complete her lading, had taken on board nineteen horses, but which was also bound to a neutral port, was in this form: the captain having come before one of the agents, he, without any previous examination or hearing, addressing himself to the captain pronounced sentence in these words—'I have confiscated your vessel and cargo,' closing the sentence with opprobrious language.

Mr. Adet, on the 18th of May last, revived his predecessor's claim of right, by treaty, to sell their prizes in our ports. This occasioned the correspondence on this subject, which you will find among the documents collected on this occasion. He contents himself, however, with considering it as a right granted, not positively, but by implication. That is, because the treaty forbids the enemies of France to sell their prizes in our ports, therefore it grants to her a right of selling her prizes. As if my friend's denial of a favor to my enemy was, in fact, a grant of the same favor to me. The simple statement of the ground of the claim would seem sufficient to show that the treaty will not support it. That sales of French prizes have been at all permitted has been owing to the indulgence of the Government. This indulgence was continued until it interfered with a new positive obligation, an obligation precisely the same that France, herself, contracted eight years subsequent to her treaty with us, and with the same power. This obligation is found in the 24th article of our treaty, and the 16th of the French treaty with Great Britain."

"I at first supposed the condemnation of American vessels for want of sea letters, in the West Indies, was an arbitrary act of the agents of the French Directory in their islands; but I find by General Pinckney's communication of the report of Mr. Montflorence that, on the same pretence, they condemn our vessels in France, whence we may conclude that it is a part of their system of unexampled aggression against a neutral power and their ally. All our accounts from the West Indies show that the French piracies are there continued, and with increasing outrage and abuse of our citizens."

"The depredations of the French in the West Indies continue. Mr. Adet, a few days since, expressed to me his opinion that they are not authorized by the French Government, remarking that it is impossible to restrain privateers from irregularities. But it happens unfortunately that nearly all the vessels or cargoes, or both, which are carried in by their privateers are condemned by the civil officers on shore. Besides, when he mentions unauthorized captures, he cannot refer to the multitude which we complain of, as made in direct violation of our treaty with France or of the law of nations, but which he himself declared would be made pursuant to the decree of the Directory on the 2d of July last."

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, May 9, 1797.

DEAR SIR: On the 6th, in the evening, I received your letter of the 12th of March. General Pinckney, on the 18th of February, at Amsterdam, wrote me his letter, No. 7, but, although he forwarded his No.

5 and No. 6, by quadruplicates, neither has come to hand, which I the more regret as the sitting of Congress will commence on the 15th, and his Nos. 5 and 6 must contain interesting details relative to the final orders of the French Directory that he should quit the Territories of the Republic.

The statement of affairs in relation to the French captures of American vessels at the date of your letter no doubt rendered your disapprobation of the project of a convoy very proper. I mean for vessels of the United States sailing from the ports of Great Britain; but the piratical conduct of their privateers in the American seas, and even on the coast of Spain, must render any measure of protection and defence both eligible and lawful. If, therefore, the British Government, on the request of the merchants trading to America, or of the underwriters, or on their own motion, order convoys for the American vessels, under a change of circumstances which show that our commerce is in more danger than when you expressed your disapprobation of the measure, the convoys are certainly not to be refused. In the West Indies, where the French Agents and privateers capture and condemn every American they meet, if bound to or from a British port, or even to their own ports, in a variety of instances, and strip and abuse our citizens, these have, for some months past, been in the practice of accepting British convoys. And what legal consequence can result from accepting a convoy in any case, except that of its being a cause of condemnation in case of capture, although the vessel should realy be neutral? It would then seem to be a matter of calculation whether to accept or decline a convoy.

If the French permit the trade between Great Britain (or rather the British dominions in Europe) and the United States to be carried on as heretofore, without making the commerce with that power a pretence for capturing and condemning our vessels and cargoes, then certainly a convoy should be declined, if the accepting a convoy is a lawful cause for capture. On this head I will mention the answer of Dr. Nicholl to a question proposed by Mr. Bayard, in the case of the American vessels laden with flour for France, which sailed under convoy of two French men-of-war, but were taken, carried into Halifax, their cargoes condemned, of course, and freight, and demurrage, and expenses denied, and the captured subjected to pay costs.

"Although (says Dr. Nicholl) a neutral ship may legally carry enemies' property, yet the belligerent has, on the other hand, a right to seize that property, paying the neutral his freight and expenses. If the neutral, in order to prevent the belligerent from exercising his legal right, puts himself under the enemies' convoy, the claim to freight and expenses is thereby forfeited. It is a departure from that impartiality which the neutral is bound to observe. The only question in this case would be, whether the ship itself was not, under the circumstances, liable to confiscation."

In another case, where the American vessel had been condemned with her cargo, Dr. Nicholl gave his opinion not to prosecute an appeal, because the circumstance of going under convoy was, in his judgment, a just cause of forfeiture. This latter opinion I have not in writing, but Mr. Wagner (the clerk charged with this business) well remembers it. But here the cause of forfeiture is not the simple act of going under convoy, but the attempting in a neutral vessel to shelter the goods of an enemy by means of the convoy; and, therefore, if this distinction be correct, an American vessel with an American cargo may innocently go under convoy.

But why do this with neutral property? Because a belligerent power, without regarding treaties or the law of nations, makes prize of such property. If, however, such unwarantable captures are not made, (and this I suppose you judge to be fact in respect to our vessels trading with Great Britain and Ireland,) there can be no reason for seeking convoys, and the doing it might give offence to the Government against which it was requested. But whenever that Government has no scruple to interrupt and injure our lawful commerce, by means of her armed vessels, we can have no scruple to accept protection from convoys of her enemies. The only question then will be, whether the Government shall formally request the convoy? This is a question of some delicacy, as it regards the foreign power to whom the request shall be made on the score of obligation. But if, for the sake of preserving a lucrative or necessary trade, that power voluntarily offers, or on the request of individuals, grants the requisite convoys, are we then to refuse them? Clearly not; and such is the sense of the President.

I have the honor to be, &c.,

TIMOTHY PICKERING.

No. 266.

Extract from the Inaugural Speech of the President of the United States, May 16, 1797.

"After the President of the United States received information that the French Government had expressed serious discontents at some proceedings of the Government of these States, said to affect the interests of France, he thought it expedient to send to that country a new minister, fully instructed to enter on such amicable discussions, and to give such candid explanations as might happily remove the discontents and suspicions of the French Government, and vindicate the conduct of the United States. For this purpose he selected, from among his fellow-citizens, a character whose integrity, talents, experience, and services, had placed him in the rank of the most esteemed and respected in the nation. The direct object of his mission was expressed in his letter of credence to the French Republic; being "to maintain that good understanding which from the commencement of the alliance had subsisted between the two nations, and to efface unfavorable impressions, banish suspicions, and restore that cordiality which was at once the evidence and pledge of a friendly union;" and his instructions were to the same effect, faithfully to represent the disposition of the Government and people of the United States, (their disposition being one,) to remove jealousies, and obviate complaints by showing that they were groundless, to restore that mutual confidence which had been so unfortunately and injuriously impaired, and to explain the relative interests of both countries, and the real sentiments of his own.

"A minister thus specially commissioned, it was expected would have proved the instrument of restoring mutual confidence between the two Republics. The first step of the French Government corresponded with that expectation.

"A few days before his arrival at Paris, the French Minister of Foreign Relations informed the American minister, then resident at Paris, of the formalities to be observed by himself in taking leave, and by his successor preparatory to his reception. These formalities they observed; and on the 9th of December presented officially to the Minister of Foreign Relations, the one a copy of his letters of recall, the other a copy of his letters of credence, these were laid before the Executive Directory. Two days afterwards the Minister of Foreign Relations informed the recalled American minister that the Executive Directory had determined not to receive another Minister Plenipotentiary from the United States until after the redress of grievances demanded of the American Government, and which the French Republic had a right to expect from it. The American minister immediately endeavored to ascertain whether, by refusing to receive him, it was intended that he should retire from the Territories of the French Republic; and verbal answers were given that such was the intention of the Directory."

Secretary of State to Mr. B. H. Phillips, Consul at Curaçoa, dated Department of State, May 23, 1797.

SIR: I have seen the letters you transmitted to Mr. Hodgeton, relative to the American vessels captured by French privateers and carried into Curaçoa, and noticed your solicitude to afford assistance and relief.

It will be right to make all the efforts in your power for that end; but when plunder is the only object of the privateers, and distressing the American commerce the proposed means of reducing the American to submission to the French Government, without any regard to treaties, to the established rules and principles of the law of nations, or the most obvious dictates of justice, you will have but a miserable prospect of success.

And as the Dutch Government at home is, under the forms of deliberations and self-direction, in real subjection to the French, we cannot expect less subserviency in the Dutch colonies.

They are greatly to be pitied and entirely excusable, as their conduct is controlled by a foreign force. Of course, such Dutchmen are excepted from the last remark as voluntarily co-operate in the nefarious measures of their allies.

I am, with great regard, &c.,

TIMOTHY PICKERING.

No. 269.

Secretary of State to Mr. B. H. Phillips, Consul at Curaçoa, dated Department of State, June 21, 1797.

SIR: I have been informed of a vessel bound to Curaçoa, to sail to-morrow morning. I have before me only your letter of the 12th of May and its enclosures; but one of these is a copy of your letter of the 25th of March, to which you refer. The subject of your communications is apparent from these papers. The French privateers and some Dutch ones, fitted out at Curaçoa, have captured, and continue to capture, the merchant vessels of the United States, in the most wanton and unjustifiable manner; and you, with the laudable zeal of a public officer and friend to your country, are anxious to recover what has been taken, and to put a stop to such enormities; such are the wishes of all men who possess any clearness of conception, and any just moral sentiments. On account of these depredations, atrociously violating treaties as well as the law of nations, the President, at the opening of the present session of Congress, recommended the equipping of our frigates and the providing a number of inferior vessels-of-war, to convoy our trade, and also to regulate the arming of our merchant vessels, all for the exclusive purpose of defence; but Congress have, as yet, concurred only in the first proposal, and that of arming the merchant vessels, I understand is, at present, rejected. Yet it is generally considered that merchant vessels have a right to arm in their own defence; and the object of the President's recommendations was not to license but to regulate their arming, to prevent abuses. I still hope that they will be regulated in their arming. To your list of captures might be added three hundred that we have heard of, and probably all these unlawful captures amount to five hundred, for many have been carried into the ports of France and Spain, as well as into the ports of their West India colonies. Some may imagine these captures will be checked by the decree of the Directory of the French Republic, of the 2d of March last, of which I enclose a copy in the Directory's official newspaper, the Redacteur, and such would have been its natural effect, if it had not required a variety of documents for ship papers not before demanded, and in the want of which many of our vessels will be surprised, and consequently condemned, where not a shadow of doubt remains on the minds of judges or tribunals of the property being American. The decree is a palpable violation of our treaty with France, which the Directory, without our participation, undertake to modify, professedly to make it conform to our treaty with Great Britain; but you will see, in comparing their decree and that treaty, that they have essentially perverted the latter, and especially in regard to American seamen. By the British treaty it is stipulated that the taking a privateering commission shall subject the person accepting the commission to be treated as a pirate, but the Directory, though referring to this same article, (21st,) and pretending to make their regulations conform to it, extend to the common seamen what in the British treaty is confined to commissioned officers, and the former, as well as the latter, are to be treated as pirates, and even, too, when they are found on board a British vessel in consequence of impressments.

In such a state of things, you will see that I can give you no instructions corresponding with your wishes. If there were a tribunal in your island where trials were had, and where you were allowed to appear, I should request you to aid your fellow-citizens in their defences. I believe you have no such court, and if you had probably you would not be allowed to interfere, or your interference would be fruitless; for such is the case at the French ports where we have any public agents. All, then, that I can say, your own understanding, your knowledge of business, and your humanity, will lead you to do: aid your fellow-citizens distressed by captures, advise them, and where you can do it, assist them in obtaining evidence to establish future claims for their losses.

I am, with much esteem and respect, &c.,

TIMOTHY PICKERING.

"The principle that free ships make free goods is also found in the treaty with Prussia, (article 12.) It is a principle that the United States have adopted in all their treaties, (except that with Great Britain,) and which they sincerely desire might become universal; but treaties formed for this object they find to be of but little or no avail; because the principle is not universally admitted among the maritime nations. It has not been regarded, in respect to the United States, when it would operate to their benefit, and may be insisted on only when it will prove injurious to their interests. You will, therefore, propose to abandon it in the new treaty, which you are empowered to renew and negotiate with Prussia. On the like ground, you are to propose to admit of articles contraband of war, and among them to enumerate timber for ship-building, tar, pitch, turpentine, and rosin, copper in sheets, sails, hemp, and cordage, and, generally, whatever may serve directly to the equipment of vessels, unwrought iron and fir planks only excepted."

No. 272.

Secretary of State to Mr. Jacob Mayer, Consul at Cape François, dated Department of State, Trenton, September 22, 1797.

SIR: I have lately received your letter of August 13, and, not long before, that of the 5th. I have to acknowledge, also, the receipt of many former letters, communicating useful information concerning the American commerce with St. Domingo, since you went thither as Consul from the United States. I can only lament that the hostile proceeding of the French Government and its agents, while bringing unparallelled distress on that commerce, did not admit of any effectual interference on your part for its relief. By intelligence from France we learn that the agents, Santhonax and his associates, are re-called, to render an account of their mission. Their conduct and the conduct of the Directory towards the United States is reprobated in strong terms by sensible, moderate, and just men in France, particularly in the Council of Five Hundred. Their conduct will fill many dark pages in history. Their resentment for pretended wrongs, and which, therefore, may more properly be resolved into certain other passions, has been measured, not by any rule of justice, but by the idea of their power. And, in estimating their power, they combined the force of the French Republic with the supposed weakness of the United States; a weakness arising from our divisions, which, by their own agents and some American traitors, who impudently pretend to be patriots, they have been taught to believe would throw a majority of our citizens into the arms of France. But this will be found to be a mistaken calculation The atrocities and piracies which have been causelessly committed on our defenceless commerce have inflicted a wound in American breasts which cannot soon be healed, and only by an entire change of conduct in the French Government and its agents, and reparation for their unexampled injuries. When I call their captures of our vessels piracies, I only repeat the name given to them through all America, and lately in the two Legislative Councils of France. Nevertheless, animated as we always have been with sincere desires to maintain peace, you will have seen by the newspapers that our Government have instituted a special commission, composed of highly respected citizens, to proceed to Paris, for the purpose of representing our just complaints, of hearing all that can be made by the French Government, and, by friendly negotiations, to conclude on an equitable mode of adjusting all our differences. And considering the change of sentiment in the people of France, who have remained ignorant, or been grossly deceived in respect to the United States; and, especially, considering the happy preponderance of wisdom and moderation in the two Councils since the new third have taken their seats, I am authorized to hope that our Commissioners will be successful. If they are not, the American Government will not be in fault; our citizens will themselves be convinced of it, and consequently prepared with a union of opinion and force to meet the alternative. The United States, who, with half their present numbers, dared resist the power of their mother country, and patiently endured the evils of a seven years' war, will not tamely submit to be trodden under foot by any foreign nation. But, for the reasons above mentioned, I trust we shall not be driven to this shocking alternative.

I have dropped these few reflections for your information and consolation amidst the wrongs and miseries of your countrymen, to which you have been so long the unhappy witness. Before the year closes I hope you will see a period to their calamities, and find yourself in a situation to fulfil the objects of your appointment with honor to yourself and advantage to your fellow-citizens. About a month since, with the President's approbation, I despatched the United States brigantine Sophia, Captain Maley, to Guadaloupe, whence he was to proceed to Porto Rico, and thence to Cape François, to relieve and bring home distressed American seamen. If he had room for more he was to proceed to Cuba.

In the mean time, and until effectual relief can be administered to all our suffering seamen, I must request you to continue your care towards them, observing all the economy which will consist with the necessary offices of humanity. You had no public funds in your hands for this purpose. You had better, therefore, transmit me an account of your expenditures, that measures for a reimbursement may be adopted. The provision in the consular act is so inadequate I hope Congress at the next session will increase it.

I am, sir, with great regard and esteem, &c.,

TIMOTHY PICKERING.

"I think it was Mr. Lee who left the following memorandum from you. If there have been seizures of American goods in British bottoms let me know it."

"No case has come to my knowledge but the one mentioned by Mr. Jefferson in his letter, dated the 24th of July, 1793, to Mr. Genet. Holland and Mackie, citizens of the United States, had laden a cargo of flour on board a British vessel, which was taken by the French frigate Ambuscade, and brought into Philadelphia. Mr. Jefferson claimed a restoration of the flour on the ground that the shippers were ignorant of the declaration of war when it was shipped. But Mr. Genet observed that, by the 14th article of the treaty of 1778, the plea of ignorance could not be urged after two months from the declaration of war; and Mr. Jefferson, finding that this term had elapsed by a few days, abandoned the claim. You will find this letter from Mr. Jefferson among the State Papers published in 1793."

SIR: Yesterday I received your letter of September 21, covering an interesting pamphlet exhibiting ——— of Santhonax, as disclosed to General Toussaint.

It is a pleasure to learn that there is any abatement of the depredations committed by the French on our commerce. The measures and decrees of the Directory, as well as of their Colonial Agents and Consuls, have received, in the Council of Five Hundred, severe and just animadversions. The result, I hope, will be the abolition of their decrees, so ruinous to the commerce of the United States. The motion and speech of Pastoret, in the Council of Five Hundred, I now enclose. The perusal will give pleasure to you and to all Frenchmen who retain their ideas of justice, honor, and the right of independent nations.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, January 13, 1798.

"The depredations of the French continue in the West Indies, notwithstanding a late decree of Raimond, sole Commissioner at Cape François, affects to soften ("adoucir") measures towards neutrals by orders (as set forth) from the Executive Directory. Accordingly, a decree of the commission, passed about a year since, for capturing and declaring good prize all neutrals (or rather Americans) bound to or from British ports, is pronounced to be repealed; nevertheless, if such vessels contain any provisions, (comestibles,) they are to be captured and brought in; and, to encourage the privateers to vigilance in this business, they are promised a reward of a dollar a barrel for each barrel of meal and salted provisions so brought in. What is to be the fate of the residue of such cargoes and the vessels is not said; but with respect to the neutrals bound to or from the "rebel ports," or "ports delivered to the English and defended by emigrants," they, as before, are to be condemned as good prize.

The persons of our fellow-citizens are also, as heretofore, treated with insult and cruelty. Such monstrous outrages may at length excite that just and general resentment which our safety, as a nation, demands. A letter of October 13, from our Consul in Cadiz, this day received, informs that the depredations in that quarter, both by French and Spanish privateers, continue with increased rigor and outrage."

CAPE NICHOLA MOLE, March 9, 1798.

GENTLEMEN: I wrote you from Curaçoa under date of the 16th of February, and 22d, enclosing sales of cargo at that place, which I hope came duly to hand. On the 23d of February I sailed for Acquin with 60 barrels of beef, 20 of pork, and two boxes of platillas, of outward cargo, and 70 barrels of salt, which I bought on your account for ballast, and five thousand one hundred and eighty-eight dollars in specie, being the net proceeds of your sales. On the 26th of February was taken by the British frigate Aquilon, and my money all taken from me on board the frigate, and my papers, and sent in here. They took $6,000 from me.

I have been here four days, but the frigate has not arrived with my papers, and nothing has been done yet—only my hatches sealed up, and a guard on board. I demanded of the captain of the frigate what I was detained for; he answered, for being bound to an enemy's port with provisions.

There is a great number sent in here under similar circumstances, and detained two months for trial, and then condemned.

I was in court yesterday, and there was a schooner condemned with 400 barrels of flour, being bound to the Cape; but I hope it will not be my case. I shall act with the greatest caution, and shall do everything in my power for your interest. They take all vessels bound to French ports with provisions, and there have been eight or ten condemned. I have not got a dollar to help myself—they took all from me.

I shall be obliged to give bonds to pay the cost if she is libelled, which we cannot as yet—the papers are not come.

If she should be condemned I shall be obliged to draw on you for the cost, which, in the last case that was tried, was $700, besides losing the vessel and cargo. If the vessel should be condemned I shall appeal, if I can possibly get a security. As I am not much known here, I am afraid I shall find it difficult. I wish you to write me on the subject.

There are so many trials to come on before mine that if I am libelled I shall not get away under three months at least.

There cannot be any vessel's papers more regular than mine are. If I am cleared I shall be obliged to come home from here, after selling the remainder of the cargo. If I attempt to go from this to a French port, I shall be a prize to the French; so I hope to be able to give you a more agreeable account in my next.

I remain, with respect, yours,

PETER ODLIN.

CAPE NICHOLA MOLE, March 20, 1797.*

GENTLEMEN: I wrote you from Curaçoa the 19th and 22d of February; also from this port the 9th, of which I sent a duplicate, informing you of my misfortune in being brought in here by the frigate Aquilon, which I hope were duly received; since which I have been libelled here, under pretence that I had osnaburgs on board, which I sold in Curaçoa. They say that osnaburgs is a substitute for sails for French cruisers. If there is no plea for condemnation they will make one. There have five or six been condemned here since I arrived, and there is not the least prospect of my being cleared; for they have no money for the support of the navy, and they are obliged to do it through policy to support their navy. There is scarce an instance of a vessel's being libelled but what they are condemned.

I have given security for the cost, and laid in my claim for the property, damages, and detention; but there are so many cases come on before mine that I am afraid that it will not be tried under three weeks at least. I shall do everything in my power to expedite the business, and act with the greatest caution, and have everything as regular as possible; but there is nothing to be done without money, and they robbed me of all I had.

I have borrowed of Mr. Thomas $300 to pay lawyer's fees and other expenses, which I could not avoid, and have drawn on you at thirty days' sight for the amount, which I have no doubt will meet due honor. The frigate that took my money out has not yet arrived, and my people are on board of her. They are going to unload the vessel, now she is libelled, and I suppose they will turn me out of her, as it is their general practice as soon as the vessel is libelled. If they do so, it will be very expensive for me ashore. If I am condemned I shall appeal, if I can get security, which I hope to be able to obtain here; but if you write me on the receipt of this it is very probable I shall be here. (Direct your letter to the care of Mr. Tissiere, for me.)

I must refer you to the bearer, Mr. Thomas, for further information; as he has been with me ever since I left Curaçoa, can give you every information with respect to me.

I remain, with respect, yours,

PETER ODLIN.

* This ought to be 1798, but is 1797 in the original.

Copy of a list of American vessels lying at Cape Nichola Mole, on the 1st day of April, 1798, sent in for adjudication.

Brig Malabar, Philadelphia, Da Costa; bound from Philadelphia to Petitguare, laden with provisions, dry goods, and iron ware; condemned for three casks of nails, and for having osnaburgs, which are esteemed contraband.

Schooner Friendship, Philadelphia, Odlin; bound from Curaçoa to Acquin, having sold the cargo at Curaçoa, and proceeding from thence with cash to Acquin to purchase a cargo, was captured, sent in, and is libelled for having cash and going to a French port, which the judge esteems contraband.

Sloop Driver, Philadelphia, Cushman; bound from Philadelphia to Cape François, laden with provisions; sent in for adjudication.

Brig Nancy, Baltimore, Jemmil; bound from Baltimore to Cape François, laden with wine, dry goods, and soap; sent in, is libelled and expected to be condemned, having osnaburgs.

Schooner Adeline, Baltimore, Tear; bound from Baltimore to Cape François, laden entirely with flour, sent in and is condemned, because the owners (McFarden & Co.) were British subjects, and carrying on a trade to French ports; the judge, likewise [in the] condemnation said that the Cape was in a state of blockade, which the owners might have known.

Schooner Polly, Baltimore, Hains; bound from Gonaives to Baltimore, laden with coffee and cotton; sent in for adjudication.

Schooner Sisters, Baltimore, Smith; from Baltimore to Jeremie; cleared for a French port, has nothing contraband on board; sent in for adjudication and libelled.

Ship Harry, New York, Bunker; bound from Gonaives to New York, laden with coffee and cotton; sent in and libelled, because she came out to Cape François a cartel ship, and brought cash for the purchase of a homeward cargo.

Schooner Nancy, New York, Norton; bound from New York to Cape François, laden with provisions; sent in for adjudication.

Brig Sally, Charleston, Huston; bound from Charleston to this port, but cleared for a Spanish port in Cuba—arrived safe at this port; after her arrival, she was seized by the collector of customs, by order of the judge, for a pretence of a breach of the laws of trade, having naval stores on board.

Schooner Fanny, Charleston, Mills; bound from Charleston to St. Thomas; sent in by a man-of-war, and condemned, vessel and cargo, on suspicion of French property.

Sloop Polly, Charleston, Pendleton; bound from Charleston to the Havana; taken by a frigate in sight of Moro; sent in and libelled, and will be condemned, having contraband articles.

Sloop James, Charleston, Johnson; seized at Jeremie, on suspicion of gunpowder, and carrying it to the enemy; having been cleared for a French port, but voluntarily went into Jeremie, to which port she was bound; she was tried at Jeremie by the marshal and condemned; the captain appealed to this court, and is libelled as French property, not finding any gunpowder.

Schooner Fanny, Newburyport, Ganderson; bound from Jacmel to Aux Cayes, having touched at the former port and could not sell; proceeding from thence to Aux Cayes, was taken, sent in, and is libelled.

Schooner William, Wilmington, Burr; bound from Wilmington to Montecristo, laden with provisions; sent in for adjudication.

The above mentioned vessels were sent in here from the 20th of February to the 1st of April, and their cargoes, according to their invoices, amount to two hundred and fifty thousand dollars, and there is no great prospect of either of them being cleared.

Philadelphia, March 17, 1798.

SIR: A letter from Mr. Fenwick, the American Consul at Bordeaux, dated the 25th of January last, to a merchant of this city, contains the following message:

"Enclosed is a law just passed. I leave you to judge its effects. The preamble gives room to believe it is meant principally at the Americans, and is an invective and reproach against them.

"Many think the Danes, Swedes, and Prussians, are engaged in concert to the measure, on certain conditions, and its effects will only operate against the Americans." Unfortunately, the preamble was not transmitted; the law enclosed consists of these two articles:

"ARTICLE 1. The condition of vessels, in relation to their equality as neutrals, shall be determined by the cargoes; consequently, all those that shall carry goods, taken from England, or from her colonies, shall be declared lawful prizes, to whomsoever they may belong.

"ARTICLE 2. Every vessel which, in the course of the voyage, shall enter into the ports of England, shall not be permitted to enter into those of the French Republic, unless she be compelled to put in, and she shall be bound to depart as soon as the necessity ceases."

As the war continues, and as it now seems scarcely possible for the United States to avoid becoming a party in it, you will doubtless be determined by your instructions of the 15th and 17th of July last, in renewing our treaties with Prussia and Sweden, and to reject the article, in each, which stipulates that free ships shall make free goods. With this prospect before us, no considerations occur which should induce its admission. But the reasons suggested in those instructions are now strongly enforced by the law of the French Republic, before cited, if, as Mr. Fenwick supposes, though general in its expressions, it is really and exclusively intended to operate against the Americans. In this case, a renewal of that stipulation is positively to be refused. The Swedish and Prussian commerce will then be only on the footing of the commerce of Denmark, with whom we have no treaty; and if we must be involved in the war, it will be desirable that the commerce of those three powers, in relation to the United States, should rest on one and the same principle.

But, if this iniquitous French law exists, (and we have no room to doubt it,) will all the northern powers submit to it? We hope not. We hope that the inordinate ambition of France, and avowed design to subjugate all Europe, (of which she already calls herself "the great nation," and "the conqueror,") will excite the resistance of all the powers whom her arms have not reached, and arouse anew those whom the course of events have induced to submit. At present, Britain appears to be the only bulwark against the universal domination of France, by sea as well as by land. It is plain that those powers who have avoided becoming parties in the present war, and have congratulated themselves on their superior policy and good fortune, will finally have no reason to rejoice; they were only reserved for future plunder and oppression. This is now strikingly verified in respect to the United States. Her exactions are as unexpected as her victories have been unexampled. Instead of stipulating for even future compensation for the many millions of which she has authorized her cruisers to rob us, she demands immediate contributions to the enormous amount of her depredations; making then [them] the measure, not of rendering justice, but of increasing her oppressions!

A full knowledge of her treatment of our envoys, and of the propositions made to them, would confound her partisans among us; convince our citizens, in general, of the impossibility of preserving their property and independence but by resistance, and produce general unanimity in the measures requisite for that end; or, if I am mistaken in this opinion, we are already under the yoke of foreign domination.

I have the honor to be, &c.,

TIMOTHY PICKERING.

No. 280.

Extract of a document published in France in 1798, commenting upon the communications made by the President of the United States to the American Congress, on the 14*th Germinal,* 6*th year, (April* 3, 1798.)

[Translation.]

"The American and English papers have lately resounded with the publication of the most strange communications which the envoys of the United States have thought it their duty to made to their Government.

"It is with respect to those envoys a deplorable monument of credulity and contradictions; and it is, with respect to that Government, a provocation still more deplorable.

"It is requisite, by the evidence of facts and the very words of the envoys themselves, to show their inconceivable error. It is requisite, by the force of reason and the mere sentiment of the happiness of the two Republics, to answer to the provocation so visibly suggested by the British Government.

"That Government, indeed, after so many and such ridiculous efforts against the French Republic, endeavors to organize corruption around it.

"Grown desperate on account of so many glorious treaties of peace which the latter has concluded, it has flattered itself by its peculiar perfidies to rekindle the former wars in Europe, and to excite against it a new war in America; but all this system of British corruption shall be exposed and confounded, and the American people shall know the height of the precipice to which they are urged by the servile friends of their former oppressors. For a long time the French Republic complained, and certainly it had a right to do so, against the inexecution of the most important parts of the convention of 1788, concluded between France and the United States. The maritime hostilities were soon followed by the most aggravating injuries. It was in vain that the Republic made a sacrifice of armaments which might compromit the American neutrality.

"The most legitimate of its armaments was soon after contested. The French vessels experienced a thousand vexations. Their prizes were no longer under the protection of the treaties. The courts of justice arrogated a jurisdiction over them; lengthy and ruinous chicaneries discouraged the captors; the French ports in the two worlds were soon declared to be blockaded by British proclamations; the vessels which departed from them were stopped on a loose suspicion of being enemies' property; those which carried provisions thither were turned back.

"On the other hand, the British ships-of-war entered the ports of the United States, after seizing French property, or property claimed to be such.

"By degrees they became stationary there, and made of them military stations, whence they attacked both the French and the Americans in connexion with France. The Republic, however, confined itself to appealing to its treaties with the United States, and to pressing their Government to cause their own neutrality to be respected.

"They answered it with a treaty clandestinely negotiated and concluded with Great Britain.

"Does this treaty, however, secure the neutrality of the United States? No. It renders the presence of the English forces in their ports lawful; it gives to England rights which, in the midst of war, ameliorate its situation to the prejudice of France; it allows the facility of again starving France and its colonies; it sacrifices the generous principles established in favor of the liberty of the seas in former treaties.

"France makes complaints; the American Government eludes and wanders from them; it multiplies official notes without approaching the main point of the question. Reparations are demanded; they are not made. It speaks of nothing but wrongs experienced by the United States; it skips over those which it makes France suffer. The treaty of 1778 is rendered more and more insignificant; and the last blows are struck at the French cruisers in the American seas by the prohibition to sell their prizes. The Republic is under the necessity, in order to manifest its too long suspended resentment, and bring about a negotiation, to appropriate to itself the same clauses of the English treaty. At length the United States, sensible only to the disagreeable consequences which have resulted therefrom to themselves, appeared to wish a reconciliation.

"Three Commissioners have been sent for that end to the French Republic; two of them, General Pinckney and Mr. Marshall, manifesting against France prejudices brought from America, or imbibed from the nature of the connexions which they lost no time in forming here; and the third, Mr. Gerry, announcing more impartiality, and manifesting himself more disposed to lend a favorable ear to everything which might reconcile the two Republics.

"From this ill suited union, which disclosed dispositions not very conciliatory, there must needs result, and there has, in fact, resulted a crooked and embarrassed career on the part of those Commissioners; hence their constant aversion to do what might reconcile their eagerness to write what might disgust.

"At first they manifested a desire to be acknowledged; but explanations of some expressions evidently insulting to the Republic, which were contained in the opening speech of the President of the United States, were demanded from them as a previous condition. They did more than to refuse; they did not even comprehend this demand, and had recourse to groundless recriminations. Soon afterwards a willingness appeared to spare them the embarrassment of the disavowals; and in order to detach them from England, and restore in a small degree the balance so strongly inclined in favor of that power by the last treaty, it was wished that an unequivocal proof of attachment to our cause, which so recently was their own, might be obtained from them; it suited the finances to exchange at that period, for specie, some Batavian inscriptions at gradual instalments; the Minister of Foreign Relations gave them to understand that their offering to purchase a certain quantity of them would be considered as a friendly act.

"They said that they did not possess the power, and they showed that they had not the will. To come at some accommodation, some friendly explanation, frequent communications with the Minister of the Exterior were necessary.

"The latter complained publicly that he did not see them, and they avowed that he caused them to be often informed of this reproach; but two of the Commissioners, shielding themselves under ceremony, refused to comply with the desire. Mr. Gerry at length resolved to go, spoke twice with the minister, and whether from embarrassment in explaining himself or fear of compromitting himself, he said but little, and did not venture to decide on anything.

"In the meantime the envoys thought themselves bound to transmit to the President of the United States a very voluminous account of their negotiation. Of what, then, could this account be composed? It was necessary to fill it with the despicable manœuvres of all the intriguers, who, seeing the Commissioners charged with the most important interests, secluding themselves from the Government with which they ought to treat, hastened together round them, and infatuated them with the idea of their credit and the opinion of their importance.

"One of these intriguers appears to have grounded himself on some acquaintance which, as a foreigner having a recommendation, he had succeeded in obtaining with the minister; another (and it is the one who is the most active) grounds himself solely upon the acquaintance which he had with the first intriguer; for he declares that he does not even know the minister. Such, moreover, is the situation of the man, whoever he may be, who is placed at the head of this department, that he is obliged to receive and listen to many persons who are far from having any share in his confidence, and he has no means of preventing the abuse they may make in his absence of the most insignificant visits, of which they avail themselves, as suits their interests, with men of no experience.

"In the publication which the American Government has made of the report of its envoys, these persons, without being avowed, are designated each by a letter. The minister, impatient to know their names, demanded them with importunity, and finally obtained the communication, which he immediately handed to the proper authority. It will be learned with pleasure that they are foreigners; and it will be readily believed that they did justice to themselves by hastening to quit the territory of the Republic. Only one of these letters, Z, designates a Frenchman, who hastened to declare himself. The language he held is irreproachable. He is presented as having sometimes served as interpreter; but it is clearly seen that he interpreted none but honorable propositions.

"As to the foreigners who are seen figuring in this negotiation, it appears that the object of their whole intrigue was to obtain from the Americans a sum of 1,200,000 livres, to be distributed for correct purposes.

"Hence begin and end all the bustle, all the conversations, all the proceedings, minutely detailed in the report of the envoys.

"It will be forever inconceivable that men, authorized to represent the United States near the French Republic, could have been for an instant deceived by manœuvres so evidently counterfeit, and that there should exist a temptation to convert the error in this respect into bad faith.

"What! Three men are sent envoys from America to France to negotiate there a reconciliation between the two Republics; embarrassed in a preliminary matter, they cannot at once confer with the minister as Commissioners; but they have a thousand ways of seeing him as individuals, either at his own house or elsewhere; and two of them constantly refuse all the facilities which are offered to them.

"This is not all: we see them present the details of their negotiations as if persuaded that the disgusting propositions which they say were made to them were addressed by a man clothed with the confidence of the Government; and, nevertheless, in the course of their recital, they suffer an avowal to escape that they several times suspected these clandestine communications, and that they finally decided to reject them for the future.

"Mr. Gerry even declares positively that these meddlers did not produce any authority, or any documents of any kind whatever.

"At the same time they continued to decline the direct communications which were offered to them continually by the minister. Is not all this a labyrinth of contradictions?

"And when we examine by what a series of intermediate persons they thought to approach the minister, whom it was so easy to them to consult immediately, is it not rendered impossible for us to think that they have seriously adopted the consequences of their recital?

"Here it is a lady, known to be connected with Mr. Pinckney, who holds with him the most innocent discourse, which has been repeated to him from one end of France to the other; lend us (says she to him one day) money in our war; we lent it to you in yours; and a conversation thus simple is taken up by Mr. Pinckney, who finds it necessary to write everything and to poison everything; it is mysteriously sent by him to his Government, as if it had any relation to the clandestine propositions made by the intriguers; thus minute is distrust! Thus is prejudice led astray in its reasonings! In this manner are the politics of some men a pest to social intercourse!

"There it is one W, whom we have not succeeded in discovering, who introduces to General Pinckney one X, a very hasty fellow, who, says he is charged with a message from the minister; who, being soon afterwards pressed to answer whether he is personally known to him, is forced to say no; but that he has the propositions which he made from Y, who, he says, has connexions with the minister; and, nevertheless, when they want to entrust Y with the negative answer to his proposition for the 1,200,000 livres, he declines being charged with it, and is compelled to avow, through a kind of shame, and at the risk of discrediting the part he was playing, that the proposition did not come from the Directory, nor even from the minister; and that it came solely from him, Y, who was desirous of saving the envoys the mortification of the disavowals. If these same men have afterwards held a different language, was it not natural for the envoys forever to mistrust their reports, and, above all, to endeavor to reach the source? They have not done so. How can this conduct be reconciled either with reason or good faith?

"In the same report they manifest themselves desirous of informing their Government with the utmost detail of everything which passed in relation to their commission; and while with such a scrupulous care they collect so many absurdities and miserable puerilities, they are silent upon the official communications which the persons employed in the office of exterior relations had with them on behalf of the minister. It is, without doubt, because those communications, agreeing with the few which the minister himself made, were pure, upright, and calculated to do honor to the French Government. It was part of their plan to pass them over in silence.

"The others, so suspicious in their origin, were defamatory in their object; they had the utmost impatience to make them known.

"They had just presented a voluminous memorial setting forth their grievances; they well knew that the minister was about to address a note to them in answer, which ought to have formed one of the authentic documents of the negotiation, and which, in fact, was sent to them in the month of Ventose last, (March 19.) They hastened to publish everything that evidently did not come from the minister, and which they endeavored to impute to him, in order, doubtless, to weaken thereby the very different impression which must have been produced by the note, wherein everything breathes a sincere desire to conciliate.

"This group of facts presents such a tissue of incongruities and contradictions that the mind is lost in it. One is at a loss to specify, with precision, the reproaches to be made to the American envoys. But it is very evident that they have been most strangely deceived if they did believe, and that they are most prefidious if they did not believe, what they relate. (In the expression of these reproaches, which escape from indignation, it is requisite to hasten to except Mr. Gerry, who, doubtless, may have been deceived, both by the foreign intriguers, and, perhaps, also by his very colleagues, but to whom no suspicion of bad faith or insincerity can attach.) Now, what could be the secret motive which caused such puerile communications to be circulated with so much eclat? How, then, can they justify the pompous affectation by which the American people has been prepared to hear them? How can we conceive that it was hoped to render the farce more imposing by fasts and public prayers?

"Doubtless a great object caused them to hazard the holding up, as discoveries of the greatest importance, the incoherent prating of two intriguers, who were foreigners with respect to France. Perhaps it was supposed that the citizens of the United States would judge of the French Government by these caricatures, and that the French Government would be sensible to such a mark of provocation.

"The effect of the outrage was calculated from the malignity of the intention, and not from the littleness of the means.

"In one word, they flattered themselves with exciting indignation instead of pity. They wish for war; and they wished that insulted France might declare it against a people whose cause she defended, and that it might be restored by her to the arms of England.

"By that war the British cabinet would gain an ally who would labor for its interests, second its projects upon the French and Spanish colonies, and retard the moment of its humiliation. By that war, too, the British Government would accelerate the execution of a favorite plan of which it has never lost sight.

"It is known that since it despaired of reuniting to the triple crown the States whose independence it was obliged to acknowledge, it aspired at least to prejudice them in favor of a limited monarchy; that it endeavored to fortify, by the similarity of constitutional forms, the habits common to the English and American people; and that it took care to keep for a long time one of the sons of George III in the vicinity of the United States. Can it then be true that, to the disgrace of the human mind, many citizens of the United States should be found who are seriously reconciled to the English form of government? Can it then be true that men, called by the public confidence to the head of the Government of the United States, have written in favor of the British constitution merely to prepare its adoption in their own country? Can it be true that a thirst for honors, greediness of wealth, and a desire of perpetuating power, have already ripened this conspiracy against liberty? If this ought to be no longer considered as a suspicion, all is explained.

"War is necessary in order to raise troops and obtain supplies. An unnatural war against old friends, against brothers, against republicans, is more especially necessary. It is necessary that this war should excite civil commotions, shock every idea of morality, and rouse to resistance the true sons of America. And pretences will arise in abundance for stigmatizing with sedition the honorable defenders of principles, and for substituting a monarchical in the room of a representative government.

"It would be hereafter unnecessary to dissemble. Such are the criminal practices of the English cabinet. Such is the blind propensity of a Government which it influences; and it is the French Republic which sacrificed the blood and fortune of its citizens in the cause of liberty; it is the French Republic that is instigated to strike the fatal blow! But, superior to the influence of her resentments, she will be actuated by nothing but the happiness of the two Republics; and she will appeal to the whole universe to judge of the sincerity of the dispositions which she has never ceased, and which she will never cease, to manifest for living in peace with America."

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Philadelphia, April 20, 1798.

DEAR SIR: On the 11th instant I received your letters numbered 25, 26, 28, 29, and 30. Your numbers 20 and 27 are still missing; the numbers 25 and 28 are duplicates. You have given a very interesting detail of the late revolution in Holland. I regret exceedingly that your No. 27, in which the detail was begun, is not arrived.

In case of a rupture between the United States and France (an event we fully expect) the absolute dependence of the Dutch upon the latter will probably draw them also into the war, unless France can find a greater advantage in allowing Holland to abstain from hostilities; seeing that all the resources which Holland can derive from our trade will, in reality, be at the disposal of the French Government, and that it is little in the power and less in the disposition of the Dutch to annoy us. It has not yet been determined what orders shall be given you in the event of a rupture with the Dutch as the allies of France.

We have yet no letters from our envoys to the French Republic since their No. 5 of the 8th of January. We are distressed at their continuing at Paris so long after, by their own declaration, there existed no hope of a negotiation on admissible terms. I shall very soon write you again. In the meantime,

I remain, &c.,

Mr. Pickering, Secretary of State, to Frederick Jacob Wichelhausen, Esq., Bremen, dated Department of State, Philadelphia, June 3, 1798.

"You suggest the idea of giving to our vessels destined to Europe certificates to show that their cargoes do not consist of the manufactures or produce of the British dominions, to guard them against the decree of the French Government passed last January. We had some time ago been apprised of the decree; but, as it is a violation of the law of nations and of every principle of justice, we shall not think ourselves bound to guard by certificates against its effects. Arms alone can secure our rights against a nation whose Government makes its power the sole rule of its conduct."

CITIZEN: You will have seen in No. 961 of the Redacteur a copy of a decree made by the Directory, in order to cause the privateers to return within the rules and limits, whence they ought never to have departed.

By this measure foreign powers will be convinced that the Executive Directory, when informed of the abuses which may be directed against them, takes every pains to stop them, and to prevent their return.

You will doubtless see, in the intention and the acts of the Directory, cause for feeling a security with respect to the commerce of your fellow citizens, so long as it shall be confined within just bounds.

I wish, citizen, that for the good of the two countries the conduct of the Federal Government may correspond with that of the Directory. In this supposition the friendly relations of the two people would be soon re-established.

French Minister of Marine and the Colonies to the agents of the marine in the ports of the Republic, dated Paris, the 24th Thermidor, 6th year, (August 11, 1798.)

[CIRCULAR.]

I observe, citizen, by the correspondence of the greater part of the administrators of the ports that the embargo recently laid upon the American vessels has occasioned the detention of the crews. The intentions of the Government were very badly understood when a measure was adopted which, in the first place, hazards the safety of these vessels, and, in the second place, appears to place us in a hostile attitude with respect to the United States, whilst the acts of the Government evince, on the contrary, that it desires a good understanding between the two Republics.

I therefore charge you, citizen, immediately upon the receipt of this, to order the discharge of all the Americans who may have been considered as prisoners of war in consequence of the embargo of their vessels.

You will be pleased to render me a prompt account of the execution of this order.

[Translation.]

Our political situation with regard to the United States, citizen, not having as yet undergone any change which can affect the respect due to neutral nations, I do not think I have need to remind you that no injury should be done to the safety and liberty of the officers and crews of any American vessel found to be in order, and that the same conduct ought to be observed towards all passengers and other citizens of the United States furnished with the necessary passports or protection. You will be pleased to use a vigilant attention that the intentions of the Government in this respect may be pursued by all those under you; and when any of them has departed from them you will do justice upon the complaints which may be addressed to you, after ascertaining their validity.

Secretary of State to Mr. Letombe, late Consul General of the French Republic.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Trenton, October 25, 1798.

SIR: This evening I received your letter marked with the date of to-morrow, the 26th, covering an arrêt of the Executive Directory of France, of the 14th of last May, ordaining "that vessels bearing the American flag should no more be admitted, under any pretext, into the military ports of Brest, L'Orient, Rochefort, Toulon, and Dunkirk." You express your regret that a despatch of such importance, sent to you by Mr. Talleyrand, Minister of Foreign Affairs, under date of June 9, should have been so long in coming to you. But there was no cause for this regret. The Congress of the United States, four days after the date of Mr. Talleyrand's letter, having forbidden all commercial intercourse of the vessels of the United States with any French ports whatever, without discrimination. I thank you for the trouble you took to furnish me with a copy of the decree of the French Convention of the 1st of October, 1793, referred to in the arrêt of the Directory of the 31st of July last. But as this arrêt is perfectly illusory, seeing it leaves all the other arrêts of the Directory and decrees of the Convention, and the interpretations of the Minister of Justice, Merlin, in consequence of which such abominable depredations have been committed on the commerce of the United States, in full force, so the decree of the Convention of October 1, 1793, to which your privateers are especially required to conform, will not produce the smallest change in their conduct towards neutral nations, its object being merely to effect the speedy condemnation of prizes, and to regulate the distribution of the prize money among the captors.

I am, with much regard, &c.,

TIMOTHY PICKERING.

N. B.—This letter having been mislaid, a fair transcript was not sent to Mr. Letombe till November 5.

No. 288.

Mr. King to the Secretary of State.

LONDON, November 28, 1798.

Annexed I send you a copy of a note from Lord Grenville respecting the French arrêt, transmitted to you with my No. 9. A late French paper contains a second arrêt, which postpones the execution of the first.

Lord Grenville to Mr. King.

The undersigned, his Majesty's Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, has the honor of communicating to Mr. King, Minister Plenipotentiary for the United States of America, for the information of his Government, that, by a decree published officially at Paris, it appears to have been declared, in the name of the French Directory, that every person being a native of or originally belonging to neutral countries, or to such as are in amity and alliance with the French Republic, who shall bear any commission under his Majesty, or who shall form a part of the crews of any British ships-of-war or other vessels, should, on the proof of that fact alone, be considered and treated as a pirate; and that it has been ordered that this resolution shall be notified to the neutral powers and to those in alliance with France.

Even this decree, contrary as it is to the usages of every civilized nation, cannot excite any surprise as proceeding from those in whose name it has been published. To the different powers who are thus insulted, and whose innocent subjects are exposed to the most cruel treatment on the part of the Government professing friendship or alliance with them, his Majesty must leave it to adopt such measures as they will, without doubt, judge necessary, in the case of an outrage hitherto unexampled in the history of the world.

The King, however, feels that protection is also due from him to those who sail under his flag, either in his Majesty's ships-of-war or in other British vessels; his Majesty has therefore not hesitated to direct it to be signified to the Commissary for French Prisoners, in Great Britain, that the first instance of the execution of this decree shall be followed by the most rigorous retaliation against the French prisoners whom the fortune of war has already, or may hereafter, place at the King's disposal.

It would certainly never be but with extreme reluctance that the King could yield to the painful necessity of exposing so many unfortunate individuals to the fatal but inevitable effects of this atrocious decree; but his Majesty will have at least the satisfaction of feeling that nothing has been omitted on his part to prevent its execution, and that the authors of it can alone be considered responsible for all its guilt and all its consequences.

GRENVILLE.

DOWNING STREET, November 27, 1798.

No. 289.

Extract from the Speech of the President of the United States to both Houses of Congress, December 8, 1798.

"The course of the transactions in relation to the United States and France, which have come to my knowledge during your recess, will be made the subject of a future communication. That communication will confirm the ultimate failure of the measures which have been taken by the Government of the United States towards an amicable adjustment of differences with that power.

"You will at the same time perceive that the French Government appears solicitous to impress the opinion that it is averse to a rupture with this country, and that it has, in a qualified manner, declared itself willing to receive a minister from the United States for the purpose of restoring a good understanding. It is unfortunate for professions of this kind that they should be expressed in terms which may countenance the inadmissible pretension of a right to prescribe the qualifications which a minister from the United States should possess, and that, while France is asserting the existence of a disposition on her part to conciliate with sincerity the differences which have arisen, the sincerity of a like disposition on the part of the United States, of which so many demonstrative proofs have been given, should even be indirectly questioned.

"It is also worthy of observation that the decree of the Directory, alleged to be intended to restrain the depredations of French cruisers on our commerce, has not given and cannot give any relief; it enjoins them to conform to all the laws of France relative to cruising and prizes; while these laws are themselves the sources of the depredations of which we have so long, so justly, and so fruitlessly complained.

"The law of France, enacted in January last, which subjects to capture and condemnation neutral vessels and their cargoes, if any portion of the latter are of British fabric or produce, although the entire property belongs to neutrals, instead of being rescinded, has lately received a confirmation by the failure of a proposition for its repeal. While this law, which is an unequivocal act of war on the commerce of the nations it attacks, continues in force, those nations can see in the French Government only a power regardless of their essential rights, of their independence and sovereignty; and if they possess the means, they can reconcile nothing with their interest and honor but a firm resistance."

Secretary of State to Mr. King, Minister of the United States to Great Britain, dated Department of State, December 13, 1798.

SIR: Mr. H. R. Pierpont, who has a cause of magnitude depending in Great Britain, has furnished me with the opinion of his council, of which a copy is enclosed. As there is no shadow of foundation for the claim set up by the French Government, of the necessity of our vessels being provided with a rôle d'équipage; as the Government of the United States never hesitated a moment in forming its opinion that this requisition, so evidently invented for the purpose of giving a color to French depredations, can be justified by no part of our late treaties with that power, and as it is represented that much property is depending in the courts of Great Britain, on questions of insurance, in which the necessity of that document, to give to American vessels the character of neutrals, is involved, it is the President's direction that you accordingly signify to the British Government, in the most suitable manner, the sentiments of this Government upon the subject, to the end that they may officially be notified to the judges, if such a notification be admissible, by corresponding with their constitutional forms.

Extract of a letter from Rufus King, Esq., Minister of the United States in London, dated September 3, 1798, to the Secretary of State of the United States.

"The pretence of this arrête (the decree of the Directory of July 31) is of a piece with the vindication of Talleyrand respecting X, Y, and Z, and the justice and sincerity of the Directory should be ascertained, not by their word, but by the following contemporaneous fact:"

"Hayley, an American citizen, master of the American ship Hare, lying in the port of London, laden with a rich cargo, the property of Americans, and bound to New York, went with my passport from London to Paris, where, in a personal interview, not with the agents of the Minister of Marine, but with the Minister himself, he disclosed his plan of bringing the ship Hare and her cargo into France; and to enable him to receive the profits of the fraud, without risking the punishment of piracy, he demanded and received from the Minister of Marine a commission, naming him the commander of a privateer that did not exist; with which in his pocket he returned to London, and soon after carried the ship Hare and her cargo as a prize into France."

"The ship and cargo were both claimed by the American owners; and upon the unveiling of this infamous proceeding before the lower tribunals, the judges hesitated, and finally refused to sanction so unheard of a fraud; though, instead of restoring the property to its lawful owners, they, on some frivolous pretence, adjudged both ship and cargo to be good prize to the nation. Lately, the tribunal, in the last resort, upon the appeal of Hayley, has reversed the judgment of the lower court, and 'decreed the ship and cargo to be condemned as good prize to this renegado.'

"If a transaction more grossly corrupt and infamous has occurred in the West Indies, I have not heard of it; and yet, with this case of unequalled infamy and corruption before them, sanctioned by the highest tribunals of the nation, the Directory expect to amuse us with a disavowal of the conduct of a few subaltern agents in a remote part of their dominions."

Besides the communications from Mr. Gerry, I have received from Fulwar Skipwith, Esq., Consul General of the United States at Paris, three letters, dated the 4th, 8th, and 22d of August, copies of which, and of the papers therein referred to, are herewith presented, excepting the decree of July 31, which appears among the communications from Mr. Gerry. Mr. Skipwith's letter of August 22, with its enclosures, was delivered to me by Dr. Logan; I had previously received the original, which had been brought over by Mr. Woodward, of Boston.

Doctor Logan having been the bearer of the last mentioned communication from the French Government, and his embassy having not only engaged the attention of the public, but been made the subject of debate in Congress, I trust it will not be deemed improper to introduce into this report some circumstances respecting it.

On the 12th of November, the Doctor came to me at Trenton; he advanced with eagerness, and handed me the packet from Mr. Skipwith. On examining its contents I told the Doctor that I already possessed the same papers.

I made some remarks on the decree of the Directory of the 31st of July, to show that it was only ostensible and illusory, and that it would not give any relief to the commerce of the United States. The Doctor, not contesting my arguments or opinions, said that more was intended to be done; but that the Directory could not accomplish it of themselves, seeing it depended on the laws which the Legislative Councils alone could change.

I answered that this was easy to be done; that as the Directory, on the 18th Fructidor, (September 4, 1797,) had garbled the two councils, and banished some and dismissed others of the best members, all who were firmly opposed to their views; and as on the new elections to supply the vacancies and the new third of the councils, the Directory sent home every new member who was not agreeable to them, everybody must see that the Directory had but to declare its will, and it would be obeyed. The Doctor said that the Directory was very well disposed towards the United States, and desired a reconciliation; that they would promote a revision of the laws in regard to privateering, so as to put the rights of neutral nations on a just footing, but that it would take some time to bring this about, "the people concerned in privateering having gained a very great influence in the two councils." Is it necessary to inquire how this very great influence has been obtained? Are the leading members owners of privateers, or do they receive their shares of prize money from those who are? Do the Legislative Councils really act independently of the Directory? Or does the same "influence" actuate both? The printed despatches of our envoys, under the date of October 29, 1797, state, on the information of Mr. Talleyrand's private agent, X, that Merlin, one of the members, and now or late President of the Directory, was to receive no part of the douceur demanded of the envoys, because he was paid by the owners of privateers, and in respect to the loan then demanded, on which subject it was suggested that one of the envoys should go to America to consult the Government, the envoys asked Mr. X if, in the mean time, the Directory would order the American property not yet passed into the hands of the privateersman to be restored? He said explicitly that they would not. The envoys asked him whether they would suspend further depredations on our commerce. He said they would not; but Mr. Talleyrand observed, that on this subject we could not sustain much additional injury, because the winter season was approaching, when few additional captures could be made. Here we see our envoys inquiring not whether the two councils would suspend those depredations, but whether the Directory would do it; and Mr. Talleyrand's agent, X, without intimating that the Directory wanted power, or that they could only "endeavor to provoke in the Legislature a revision of their maritime laws," answered peremptorily that the Directory would not suspend the depredations. The truth is, that it was an act of the Directory alone, (their decree of the 2d of March, 1797,) which authorized and produced more extensive depredations on the commerce of the United States than any other decree or law of the French Republic. To effect a repeal of that decree, no application to the Legislative Councils could be necessary. They could also have repealed another of their own decrees, that of the 2d of July, 1796, which subjected neutral property, and particularly that of American citizens, to the discretion of their consuls and cruisers in the European seas, as well as of their privateers and agents in the West Indies, and on which these agents have founded other numerous decrees, which have occasioned those shocking depredations and abuses there and on the coast of the United States, which the Directory, by their decree of the 31st of July last, affect to restrain.

When the Executive Directory wished to enlarge the field of depredations on neutral commerce, and on the fourth of January, 1798, proposed to the two councils the project of the iniquitous law "to declare to be good prize every vessel and cargo, to whomsoever belonging, if any part of the cargo came from England or her possessions," there was a ready obedience. "The Directory thinks it urgent and necessary to pass the law. The plan of a decree is reported to the Council of Five Hundred on the 11th; and 'urgency' being declared, is immediately and unanimously adopted. It goes to the Council of Ancients; that council approves the act of urgency, and on the 18th of January the project of the Directory becomes a law.

This law was necessary for the French Government; so many American vessels had been entrapped by the Directory's decree of March 2, 1797, requiring the rôle d'équipage, that the residue were now generally provided with that paper; some new pretext was, therefore, requisite for fleecing the people of the United States of their property; and an ordinance of one of the Kings of France, made near a century past, having declared lawful prize the vessels and their cargoes in which was found English merchandise, belonging to enemies, the Directory declare that the provisions of this ordinance ought to be extended to comprehend the vessels and cargoes of friends; that is, of allied and neutral nations.

This Directory knew that the United States, whose inhabitants were chiefly cultivators, required a greater supply of English manufactures than any other neutral country of equal population; and those manufactures too were, from the course of American commerce, combined with almost all our mercantile operations, and pervaded entirely our great coasting trade.

Hence, it is evident that this law was chiefly aimed at them."

Secretary of State to the American Consul, Havana, dated Department of State, January 25, 1799.

SIR: A Mr. Dickrick, residing in Philadelphia, and calling himself a citizen of the United States, has a son-in-law named Peter Brabandt, a Frenchman, now in Havana, who writes to him that he is unable to obtain a passage to this country, on account of the opinion prevailing there among the masters of American vessels that it is unlawful to bring Frenchmen to the United States. As this opinion is erroneous, there being no law at present existing to prohibit them coming hither, I have desired Mr. Dickrick to write to his son-in-law to apply to you, who would explain away the scruples on this point of the master of the vessel in which he might choose to take his passage.

I am, sir, &c.,

TIMOTHY PICKERING.

P. S. It will be desirable, however, to avoid any encouragement, generally, to the coming of Frenchmen to the United States.

No. 296.

Secretary of State to Letombe, late Consul General of France in the United States.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Philadelphia, February 4, 1799.

SIR: I have received your letter of the 29th ultimo, occasioned by my introducing into my late report on French affairs, relative to the United States, your repeated declarations to me, of your collecting and transmitting to your Government the account of the depredations committed by French privateers on the commerce of the United States, as a proof that the Directory of the French Republic had been, not recently, as they pretend, but long since, acquainted with them, the fact of your repeated declarations to me, as stated in my report, you do not call in question; but you say you always told me that you believed your Government was not informed of them. This addition I do not remember. But whether you did, or did not, so express your belief, is of no consequence; I stated a fact; you admitted it; the public will, from that and other concurring facts, draw their own inferences It was impossible that I should believe, as you say you always professed to me to believe, that the Directory were uninformed of the depredations of which we are speaking; nobody will believe that your letters, for two or three years past, have not reached Paris, when you have yourself sent to France several flags of truce, and American vessels have all that time been going from the United States to France. I do not, therefore, think "my justice at all concerned to give publicity to your letter." If I had erroneously stated any fact respecting you, be assured I would most readily correct the statement, and with the same publicity; it is by the force of truth alone that I ever expect to establish my positions.

The rest of your letter, about your writing to a member of the Directory, and to the minister of Foreign Relations, and inviting your colleague, Dupont, to inform your Government of those depredations, and your letters to Hedouville, the agent in Saint Domingo; these things are also of no consequence. Doubtless, the principal object of the "information was to convince the Directory that we would no longer patiently bear their insults and injuries; and that they must change their measures; or, at least, profess to change them to prevent a rupture." Hence, as you inform me in your letter, Mr. Dupont "felicitates himself on his return to France," because "it has not a little contributed to prevent a rupture so fatal to the two Republics."

As to Hedouville's arrêt of the 18th of July last, to which, and his arrêt of the 17th, you refer me, telling me that you think I shall therein see "the rights of neutrals, and the laws of nations respected," the very suggestion is an insult. His arrêt of July 18, in declaring that American (as well as other neutral) vessels, destined to the ports of St. Domingo remaining faithful to the Republic—that is, to French ports, in distinction from the ports of other nations, and especially English ports—shall not be seized by the vessels-of-war or privateers of the Republic, is a confirmation of former decrees violating the law of nations, and the rights of the United States in particular. Who gave to the French Republic and its agents a right to regulate the commerce of the world? Whence does it derive its pretensions to prescribe to neutrals the ports and nations with whom they may trade, and the ports and nations independent of France with which neutrals shall have no commerce? Inordinate ambition, whose success will gratify so many other passions, is the source of those pretensions. The justice or injustice of a measure has long since ceased to be a point of any consideration with the French Government; this is demonstrated by its acts towards neutral nations in general, and especially towards the United States.

I am, sir, your obedient servant,

TIMOTHY PICKERING.

Secretary of State to General Etienne Desfourneaux, particular agent of the French Executive Directory at Guadaloupe and its dependencies, dated Department of State, Philadelphia, March 16, 1799.

SIR: Your letters to the President of the United States should have been addressed to the Department of State; they have, however, been submitted to his consideration. The Retaliation being on the point of departure with French prisoners, in exchange for the Americans you liberated, I must reply in a few words.

I can only observe that the depredations committed on the commerce of the United States by French armed vessels, in violation of the law of nations, obliged the United States to take such measures as they judged best adapted to protect their commerce and to cause their rights to be respected. One measure has been to restrain and prohibit all commercial intercourse between the United States and every part of the French dominions. These restraints and prohibitions cannot be withdrawn, unless their cause be first removed. The depredations of French armed vessels must wholly cease. Their conforming to the laws of the French Republic will not satisfy. The depredations of which we have so long conplained have originated in those laws. But when the French Republic, or any island belonging to it, shall cease to violate our rights by such depredations, so that the President of the United States may deem it safe, expedient, and for their interest, to remit and discontinue the restraints and prohibitions above mentioned, our commercial intercourse may be renewed. For your further information, I take the liberty of enclosing the law of the United States for suspending the commerce between the two nations.

I am, with due consideration, sir, &c.,

TIMOTHY PICKERING.

"I now enclose the passports of Messrs. William Rice Apthorp and Charles Ward Apthorp, and return to you the certificates from Mr. Cooper, concerning their nativity, with the date of my certificates to the latter corrected.

"Without being apprised of the allegation against the sufficiency of the papers on board of your vessels, I feel some embarrassment in giving a formal opinion upon them, since the question embraces considerable detail and is influenced by circumstances. I think it probable the defect of the rôle d'équipage is what you wish to obviate by my certificate; and in that supposition it may be useful to inform you that having before, upon the application of a person having an insurance cause depending in England, given a certificate, importing that such a document was not requisite to American vessels, either by the treaties or laws of the United States, it was not deemed by the court legal evidence. But the counsel of the insured having advised, in consequence of an intimation thrown out by the court, that a request should be made to Mr. King, our minister in London, to communicate to the British Minister of Foreign Affairs the opinion of the American Government that the rôle d'équipage was not necessary, to the end that the latter might notify it to the judges, in which form that opinion would meet with due attention, Mr. King was instructed to make the communication accordingly."

No. 298.

Secretary of State to Mr. King, dated Department of State, Philadelphia, May 8, 1799.

DEAR SIR: I have again to represent to you how much the American trade is harassed by British cruisers, by what I conceive to be a perverse construction of the 18th article of the commercial treaty relating to articles contraband.

The ship General Washington, of this port, is taken by the British armed vessels, the Lynx and Pheasant, and carried into Bermuda. The pretences for the capture, as it is understood, are, that she had on board some bales of ticklenburgs and osnaburgs, and about thirty casks of 6d, 8d, 10d, 12d, and 20d nails.

The ship was destined for New Orleans, which is the depot of the cotton raised in our Mississippi Territory and of the skins and furs collected in traffic with the Indians. The cotton and indigo raised and the skins collected in Louisiana also find there a market. The trade between us and New Orleans is very much increased, and is daily becoming more and more important to us. Osnaburgs and ticklenburgs are essential to the summer clothing of the slaves and laborers, and for bags for the cotton. The nails are necessary for house building. The 18th article of the treaty declares "sails" to be contraband; but those coarse linens are neither "sails" nor sail cloth. And although in extreme necessity, when the proper cloth is not to be obtained, some of the highest and most trifling sails might be made of ticklenburg; yet that is not, every one knows, the use for which it is imported and to which it is generally applied; and a reasonable construction of the words "whatever may serve directly to the equipment of vessels," must exclude all three of the articles in question. It cannot be the contingent and possible application of articles in the equipment of vessels, but the direct and principal use and destination for that object, which must determine them to be contraband.

So far have perverse constructions of the 18th article been carried, that leather (as I am informed) has been pronounced contraband because used in fixing the boxes of ships' pumps, and perhaps one pound in a thousand or two may be so used.

It is really important to come to an understanding with the British Government on this subject, as well for political as commercial considerations; and I hope, if not already done, that you will find an early opportunity to converse with Lord Grenville upon it, and that orders will be issued to put a stop to the mischief.

I must not omit to mention another refinement in some of the Colonial Vice Admiralty Courts. I am informed that they make a distinction between flat and square bars of "unwrought iron," declaring the latter contraband because they may be easily converted to ships' bolts! I will only observe upon this that square bars of iron are wanted for common domestic uses by every farmer in the country. I speak from my own knowledge; and I believe that our forges never deliver a ton of iron without a proportion of it in square bars. A few tons of bar iron were on board the General Washington.

I am, sir, &c.,

TIMOTHY PICKERING.

Secretary of State to Doctor Bouvier, New York, dated Department of State, Philadelphia, May 21, 1799.

SIR: I have just received your letter of yesterday. You flatter yourself that you can persuade General Desfourneaux to put an end to all privateering against American vessels. Of this there does not appear to me a shadow of probability. He knows by the letter I some time since sent him that commercial intercourse can be renewed with Guadaloupe only on that condition; but he has yet given no answer. He will answer, or rather he would have answered before this time, if he felt any disposition to cease his licensed piracies. But he is so far from manifesting such a disposition, that, by his arrêt of the 14th of March, he has directed the capture of all American vessels without exception.

He no more regards the real interest of Guadaloupe than his masters, the Directory, do that of France; both prefer the plunder to the commerce of neutral nations. Under these circumstances, I do not think it proper to accept of your overtures for a flag of truce and permission to export and import merchandises, under the idea of thereby defraying the expenses of your voyage.

"The British men-of-war cruising off Cuba and the Bahamas are too much occupied in capturing American vessels trading to the Havana and New Orleans. No. 301.

Secretary of State to Mr. Regis Leblanc, French Consul.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Philadelphia, May 30, 1799.

SIR: I have received your letter dated the 22d of this month and the one dated this day. In the former you enclosed a project of a decree, which, if adopted by General Desfourneaux, you imagine might be a sufficient ground on which the President might open the commercial intercourse between the United States and Guadaloupe. The preamble to your project is extremely exceptionable. I demonstrated in my report of the 18th of January last that the decree of the Directory of the 31st of July, 1798, had not given, could not give, nor was intended to give, any protection or relief to the American commerce, vexed, pillaged, and destroyed by French cruisers. Yet you present this decree as an evidence of the desire of the French Government to live in peace with the United States. After the example of the Directory, too, you affect to consider the aggressions of which the people of the United States complain as having been committed by foreigners or pirates. You do, indeed, allow that even French privateers have given to the Government of the United States just causes of complaint. But the fact is, that the piracies, plunderings, and captures, of which we complain, have been made by armed vessels commissioned by the French Government; and if foreigners or pirates, in the appropriate sense of the word, have, under cover of the French flag, vexed our commerce, their acts and piracies have been approved and sanctioned by the French Government, whose tribunals have acquitted and released no American vessels on the ground of their having been captured by pirates. The first article of your project, to repeal General Desfourneaux's arrêt of the 14th of March, is of no consequence, as that arrêt only contained a formal declaration of doing what French cruisers had done for two years preceding. Your second article proposes that the arrêt of the Executive Directory of the 31st of July, 1798, should be executed in all its parts towards American vessels. That is, all the laws of the French Republic, and all the arrêts of the Directory, authorizing the capture of American vessels, are to be fully executed, while those laws and arrêts are the sources of the injuries complained of. It is not necessary to notice any other article, as these, which constitute the basis of your project, are utterly inadmissible. Nothing short of an absolute exemption from capture will give that security to the American commerce which will authorize the opening of the trade between the United States and any part of the French dominions. When that shall be fixed, the other regulations necessary to the safety of our trade with French islands, or any of them, will be considered If the French colonies discern their true interest, they will wholly break up privateering; for, without the unjust captures and confiscations of neutral property, more especially the property of citizens of the United States, their prizes will not indemnify the owners for the expense of equipping privateers. So long, therefore, as the French Government and its agents allow of privateering, particularly in the West Indies, so long we must presume, whatever professions are made, that they mean to make a prey of neutral commerce.

I am, sir, &c.,

TIMOTHY PICKERING.

Proclamation by the President of the United States, renewing commerce with St. Domingo, dated June 26, 1799.

Whereas, by an act of the Congress of the United States, passed the 9th day of February last, entitled "An act further to suspend the commercial intercourse between the United States and France, and the dependencies thereof," it is provided that, at any time after the passing of this act, it shall be lawful for the President of the United States, if he shall deem it expedient and consistent with the interests of the United States, by his order, to remit and discontinue, for the time being, the restraints and prohibitions by the said act imposed, either with respect to the French Republic or to any island, port, or place belonging to the said Republic, with which a commercial intercourse may safely be renewed, and also to revoke such order, whenever in his opinion the interest of the United States shall require; and he is authorized to make proclamation thereof accordingly.

And whereas the arrangements which have been made at St. Domingo for the safety of the commerce of the United States, and for the admission of American vessels into certain ports of that island, do, in my opinion, render it expedient and for the interest of the United States to renew a commercial intercourse with such ports:

Therefore, I, John Adams, President of the United States, by virtue of the powers vested in me by the above recited act, do hereby remit and discontinue the restraints and prohibitions therein contained, within the limits and under the regulations here following, to wit:

1st. It shall be lawful for vessels which have departed or may depart from the United States to enter the ports of Cape François and Port Republicain, formerly called Port au Prince, in the said island of St. Domingo, on and after the first day of August next.

2d. No vessel shall be cleared for any other port in St. Domingo than Cape François and Port Republicain.

3d. It shall be lawful for vessels which shall enter the said ports of Cape François and Port Republicain after the thirty-first day of July next to depart from thence to any port in said island between Monte Christi on the north and Petit Goave on the west; provided it be done with the consent of the government of St. Domingo, and pursuant to certificates or passports expressing such consent, signed by the Consul General of the United States, or Consul residing at the port of departure.

4th. All vessels sailing in contravention of these regulations will be out of the protection of the United States, and be moreover liable to capture, seizure, and confiscation.

[L. S.] Given under my hand, and the seal of the United States, at Philadelphia, the twenty-sixth day of June, in the year of our Lord 1799, and of the independence of the said States the twenty-third.

JOHN ADAMS.

By the President:

TIMOTHY PICKERING, Secretary of State.

Chief Clerk in the Department of State to Samuel Williams, Esq., United States Agent at London, dated Department of State, June 11, 1799.

SIR: By the Secretary of State's direction, I have the honor to enclose to you ten more commissions for private armed vessels, with the necessary instructions and bonds, and to be, &c.,

JACOB WAGNER.

No. 305.

Secretary of State to Mr. Samuel S. Cooper.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Philadelphia, August 3, 1798.

SIR: On the 13th of June, 1798, Congress passed an act entitled "An act to suspend the commercial intercourse between the United States and France and the dependencies thereof." By the fifth section of this act it was provided, That if, before the next session of Congress, the Government of France, and all persons acting by or under their authority, should clearly disavow, or should be found to refrain from the aggressions, depredations, and hostilities, which had been and were by them encouraged and maintained against the vessels and other property of the citizens of the United States, and against their national rights and sovereignty, in violation of the faith of treaties and the law of nations, it was made lawful for the President of the United States, being well ascertained of the premises, to remit and discontinue the prohibitions and restraints imposed by that act. But no such disavowal and refraining from aggressions, depredations, and hostilities, having taken place, Congress, in their late session, passed "An act further to suspend the commercial intercourse between the United States and France and the dependencies thereof." By this act it is provided, "That at any time after the passing of this act, it shall be lawful for the President of the United States, if he shall deem it expedient and consistent with the interest of the United States, by his order, to remit and discontinue, for the time being, the restraints and prohibitions aforesaid, either with respect to the French Republic, or to any island, port, or place belonging to the said Republic, with which a commercial intercourse may safely be renewed."

The President having received such information of the general conduct of the Government and people of the Isle of France towards the citizens of the United States as induces an expectation that a commercial intercourse with that island may be renewed on terms compatible with the act of Congress last above recited, he has been pleased to appoint you the agent of the United States, to repair immediately to the Isle of France, to make to the Government thereof a proposal to renew the commercial intercourse between it and the United States.

The first act of Congress above recited exhibits the causes of the prohibition of commercial intercourse with the French dominions. But it is understood that the Isle of France has not committed such aggressions, depredations, and hostilities, as are chargeable to the French Republic and to her West India colonies; and that the Government of that island will probably be disposed to adopt such measures as may render our commerce secure. These are:

1st. To admit the vessels of the United States into the port or ports of the Isle of France, to give them protection there, and a perfect freedom of trade, in the sale of their cargoes, and in the purchase of the produce of the island.

2d. To exempt all vessels of the United States from capture by any armed vessels of the island; and if captured by any other armed vessels and brought within its jurisdiction, to give no asylum to the latter, and to cause the American citizens to be set at liberty and their vessels and other property to be restored.

The Government of the Isle of France, adopting these propositions for the safety of our commerce, and making adequate regulations to enforce their observance, the President will think it expedient and for the interest of the United States to remit and discontinue the existing restraints and prohibitions on the commercial intercourse between the United States and that island.

The propriety and utility of these arrangements will be apparent from the following considerations:

1st. The actual state of the marine and navigation of the mother country, and the war in which it continues to be engaged in Europe, forbid the hope of obtaining from thence the supplies essential to the accommodation, the well-being, and prosperity of the colony.

2d. These circumstances, and the remote situation of the Isle of France, have obliged the Colonial Government, during several years past, to consult its own safety, and to make divers regulations not conformable to the general laws of the French Republic, but adapted to its own wants and condition, and necessary to its prosperity. The latter can by no means be so effectually promoted as by encouraging a commerce by which all its wants would be supplied, and great profits be attained in a fair and honorable exchange of merchandise. By these means, too, the colony will be rendered more interesting and useful to the mother country at the conclusion of the war. It would seem, indeed, that a state of perfect neutrality would be most beneficial to the Isle of France. That was the state in which the United States long continued and flourished; it was the state in which they anxiously wished to remain during the present war, and they bore countless injuries rather than depart from it; but the unexampled aggressions and depredations committed by the armed vessels of the French Republic, which she refused to discontinue or relax, at length compelled us to arm in our own defence.

The foregoing considerations may be mentioned and urged, on your part, to the Government of the Isle of France, as inducements to adopt the pacific and friendly plan of intercourse now proposed; to which you will add such others as shall occur, and circumstance may enforce, to obtain and secure freedom to our commerce with that island, with the southern parts of Africa and the East Indies; and we confidently expect you will succeed. We cannot imagine that a colony whose prudence, sound policy, and energy, rejecting wild theories, have hitherto saved it from massacre and devastation, will now abandon its wise principles, and prefer the uncertain gains of privateering to the regular, sure, and honorable profits of a fair trade. The system of depredations allowed and encouraged by the Government of the French Republic, while it has annihilated its trade and navigation, bringing ruin on its commercial towns and cities, and general distress on the nation, has stamped with indelible ignominy the name of the Republic.

That system, profitable only to a few, and detested by the body of the nation, must shortly be changed; and particularly towards the United States, whose envoys, named last February by the President to adjust all differences with France, the French Government have now engaged to receive in their official character, promising that they shall enjoy all the prerogatives belonging to it by the law of nations; and that one or more ministers shall be duly authorized to treat with them. The words of Mr. Talleyrand, Minister of Exterior Relations, in his letter of May 12, 1799, to Mr. Murray, our minister at the Hague, are as follows, viz:

"Le Directoire Executif informé de la nomination de Mr. Oliver Ellsworth, de Mr. Patrick Henry, et de vous même, en qualité d'Envoyés Extraordinaires et de Ministres Plenipotentiaires des Etats Unis pres de la Republique Française, pour discuter et terminer tous les differends qui subsistent entre les deux pays, voit avec plaisir que sa perseverance dans des sentimens pacifiques ait tenu les voies, ouvertes à une conciliation prochaine. Il a manifesté depués long tems ses intentions à ce sujet. Veuillez transmettre à vos collegues et acceptez vous même l'assurance franche et explicite, qú'il recevra les envoyés des Etats Unis dans le caractère officiel dont ils sont attachées par le droit des gens, et qú'un ou plusieurs ministres seront duement autorisés à traiter avec eux."*

But if this negotiation with the French Government should fail of closing all disputes between the two nations, the Government of the Isle of France will evidently consult its own honor, and the best interest of that colony, by acceding to the pacific and friendly overtures which you are now authorized to make. If you should find at the Isle of France any American vessels already captured, and not condemned, you will use your best endeavors to obtain their release. The causes set up by the French Government for capturing and condemning American vessels are not warranted by the law of nations, or by the treaties between France and the United States.

Indeed, not one cause occurs to my recollection which has not been a clear violation of the law of nations or of an existing treaty.

1. The order for capturing neutral vessels, including American, which had enemies property on board, in direct violation of the 23d article of the commercial treaty.

2. The order for treating neutrals, as these suffered the British to treat them, an indefinite rule, framed on purpose to subject American vessels to indiscriminate depredation. It being impossible for French cruisers and tribunals to know how the British conducted towards us; and even if the British violated the law of nations, it could not justify the French in similar violations.

3. The order for capturing and condemning American vessels for the want of a rôle d'équipage on board, under pretence that the treaty required it, whereas the treaty does not require it.

* The Executive Directory being informed of the nomination of Messrs. Oliver Ellsworth, Patrick Henry, and of yourself, in the capacity of Envoys Extraordinary and Ministers Plenipotentiary of the United States near the French Republic, to discuss and terminate all the differences which subsist between the two countries, sees with pleasure that its perseverance in its pacific views has kept open the way to a speedy reconciliation. It has for a long time manifested its intentions upon this subject. Be pleased to transmit to your colleagues and accept the full and explicit assurance that it will receive the envoys of the United States in the official character which they possess; that they shall enjoy all the prerogatives that are attached to by the law of nations, and that one or more ministers shall be duly authorized to treat with them.

4. The order declaring good prize all neutral vessels having on board any articles of the produce or manufacture of Great Britain, although the indisputable property of neutrals. This is so flagrant a violation of the law of nations, and of the rights of neutrals, as no one can, without ignominy, attempt to justify or excuse. For all losses and damages to American citizens, occasioned by captures under those orders, compensation will be demanded and insisted on. And if you find at the Isle of France any American vessels on which sentences of condemnation have been passed, and whose release you cannot obtain, they must be left on this footing of future compensation when the differences between the United States and France shall be adjusted. Wishing you success in this enterprise, I remain, with much respect, sir, your most obedient servant,

TIMOTHY PICKERING.

WASHINGTON, September 20, 1800.

"The aggressions, sometimes of one and sometimes of another belligerent power, have forced us to contemplate and to prepare for war as a probable event. We have repelled, and we will continue to repel, injuries not doubtful in their nature, and hostility not to be misunderstood. But this is a situation of necessity, not of choice; it is one in which we are placed, not by our own acts, but by the acts of others, and which we change so soon as the conduct of others will permit us to change it.

"The regularly accumulating injuries sustained from France had, in 1798, progressed to such a point as to leave to the United States no reasonable ground of doubt that war was to be expected, and that force, and force only, could be relied on for the maintenance of our rights, as a sovereign and independent nation. Force, therefore, was resorted to; but in the very act of resorting to it, our preference for peace was manifest, and it was apparent that we should return to our natural situation so soon as the wrongs which forced us from it should cease, and security against their repetition be offered. A reasonable hope that this state of things may be attained has been furnished by the recent conduct and overtures of the French Government; America meets these overtures, and in doing so only adheres to her pacific system."

"Some of the owners of privateers have been in Paris since our arrival, and I think it not improbable that their object has been to exert their influence, which, unfortunately, is very considerable, to prevent any accommodation which may rescue from them the specie they have not yet received. I greatly fear they will be successful. It is said that Merlin, when Minister of Justice, received four thousand louis from the owners of privateers for the direction concerning the rôle d'équipage; and it is said publicly by them that money influences the tribunals. However this may be, I am entirely persuaded that the courts, even in the last resort, are political, and will carry into effect the will of the Directory, without any respect to its legality. This is insured on by the nice appointment made since the last revolution. The members of the tribunals who judge, in the first instance, are, generally speaking, themselves the captors."

"It is notorious that a greater number of privateers are now fitting out than have been employed in any former period of the war, and the Government is consigning to the merchants the national ships-of-war for the purpose of cruising."—No. 1.

"The subject of the rôle d'équipage was also mentioned, and we asked what assurance we could have if France insisted on the right of adding to the stipulations of our treaty, or of altering them by municipal regulations, that any future treaty we could make should be observed. M. Bellamy said that he did not assert the principle of changing treaties by municipal regulations, but that the Directory considered its regulation concerning the rôle d'équipage as comporting with the treaty. We observed to nim that none of our vessels had what the French termed a rôle d'équipage, and that if we were to surrender all the property which had been taken from our citizens in cases where their vessels were not furnished with such a rôle, the Government would be responsible to its citizens for the property so surrendered, since it would be impossible to undertake to assert that there was any plausibility in the allegation that our treaty required a rôle d'équipage."

"Since our arrival at Paris the Tribunal of Cassation has rejected Captain Scott's petition, complaining of the condemnation of his vessel by the Civil Tribunal, for the want of a rôle d'équipage. Mr. Duclos, the advocate employed in behalf of the owners of the American vessels who have appealed, in the last resort, to the Tribunal of Cassation, informs that notwithstanding all the arguments he made use of to the Reporter and Commissary of the Executive Directory to put off the hearing of the Rosanna, as a diplomatic case, till the issue of our negotiations is known, that case is set down for hearing, and will come on the 29th or 30th instant.

"The same advocate also says that it is obvious that the tribunal have received instructions from the officers of the Government to hasten their decisions, and that it was hardly worth while to plead, for all our petitions in Cassation would be rejected. Our advocates, however, decline giving their sentiments on this subject in writing, under an apprehension of committing themselves."

[Without date.]

CITIZEN MINISTER: Since their letter of the 17th of January was prepared, the undersigned are informed by the journals that the legislative councils of the French Republic have decreed that—

1st. The condition of ships, in everything which concerns their character as neutrals or enemies, shall be determined by their cargo; consequently, every vessel found at sea laden in the whole or in part with merchandise coming out of England or its possessions shall be declared good prize, whoever may be the proprietor of such commodities or merchandise.

2dly. No foreign vessel which, in the course of its voyage, shall have entered into an English port, shall be admitted into any port of the French Republic but in the case of necessity; in which case such vessel shall be obliged to depart from such port so soon as the cause of entry shall have ceased.

This decree too deeply affects the interest of the United States to remain unattended to by their ministers. They pray you, therefore, Citizen Minister, to receive their respectful representations concerning it.

The object of the decree is to cut off all direct intercourse between neutrals and Great Britain or its possessions, and to prevent the acquisition, even by circuitous commerce, of those articles which come from England or its dominions.

The right of one nation to exchange with another the surplus produce of its labor for those articles which may supply its wants or administer to its comfort is too essential to have been ever classed among those admitted to be in any degree doubtful. It is a right in ceding which a nation would cede the privilege of regulating its own interests and providing for its own welfare. When any two nations shall choose to make war on each other, they have never been considered, nor can they be considered, as thereby authorizing themselves to impair the essential rights of those who shall choose to remain at peace. Consequently those rights, the free exercise of which is essential to its interests and welfare, must be retained by a neutral power, whatever nations may be involved in war.

The right of a belligerent to restrain a neutral from assisting his enemy by supplying him with those articles which are defined as contraband has been universally submitted to; but to cut off all intercourse between neutrals and an enemy; to declare that any single article which may have come from the possessions of the enemy, whoever may be its owner, shall, of itself, be sufficient to condemn both vessel and cargo, is to exercise a control over the conduct of neutrals which war can never give, and which is alike incompatible with their dignity and their welfare.

The rights of belligerents are the same. If this might be exercised by one, so might it be exercised by every other. If it might be exercised in the present, so might it be exercised in every future war. This decree is, therefore, on the part of France, the practical assertion of a principle which would destroy all direct or circuitous commerce between belligerent and neutral powers; which would often interrupt the business of a large part of the world, and withdraw or change the employment of a very considerable portion of the human race.

This is not all. It is the exercise of a power which war is not admitted to give, and which, therefore, may be assumed in peace as well as war. It essentially affects the internal economy of nations, and deranges that course of industry which they have a right to pursue, and on which their prosperity depends.

To acquiesce, therefore, in the existing state of things, under a principle so extensive and so pernicious, is to establish a precedent for national degradation which can never cease to apply, and which will authorize any measures which power may be disposed to practice.

France, therefore, will perceive that neutral Governments, whatever may be their dispositions towards this Republic, are impelled by duties of the highest obligation to remonstrate against a decree which, at the same time, invades their interests and their independence; which takes from them the profits of an honest and lawful industry, as well as the inestimable privilege of conducting their own affairs as their own judgment may direct.

It is hoped that the remonstrances of the United States on this subject will derive additional force from their subsisting engagements with France, and from a situation peculiar to themselves.

The twenty-third article of the treaty of amity and commerce of the 6th of February, 1778, is in these words: "It shall be lawful for all and singular the subjects of the most Christian King and the citizens, people, and inhabitants of the said United States, to sail with their ships with all manner of liberty and security, no distinction being made who are the proprietors of the merchandises laden thereon, from any port to the places of those who now are, or hereafter shall be, at enmity with the most Christian King or the United States. It shall likewise be lawful for the subjects and inhabitants aforesaid to sail with the ships and merchandises aforementioned, and to trade with the same liberty and security from the places, ports, and havens, of those who are enemies of both or either party, without any opposition or disturbance whatsoever, not only directly from the places of the enemy aforementioned to neutral places, but also from one place belonging to an enemy to another place belonging to an enemy, whether they be under the jurisdiction of the same prince or under several. And it is hereby stipulated that free ships shall also give a freedom to goods, and that everything shall be deemed to be free and exempt which shall be found on board the ships belonging to the subjects of either of the confederates, although the whole lading, or any part thereof, should appertain to the enemies of either, contraband goods being always excepted. It is also agreed, in like manner, that the same liberty be extended to persons who are on board a free ship with this effect, that although they be enemies to both or either party, they are not to be taken out of that free ship unless they are soldiers, and in actual service of the enemy."

The two nations, contemplating and providing for the case when one may be at war and the other at peace, solemnly stipulate and pledge themselves to each other that, in such an event, the subjects or citizens of the party at peace may freely trade with the enemy of the other; may freely sail with their ships in all manner of security to and from any port or place belonging to such enemy. Nor is this all. Not only goods coming from the hostile territory, but the very goods of the enemy himself may be carried with safety in the vessels of either of the contracting parties.

You will perceive, Citizen Minister, without requiring the undersigned to execute the painful task of drawing the contrast, how openly and entirely the decree of the councils opposes itself to the treaty between France and the United States.

In addition to the hitherto unceded rights of a sovereign and independent nation, in addition to the rights stipulated by compact, the undersigned will respectfully submit other considerations growing out of the peculiar situation of the United States, manifesting the particular hardships the decree complained of must impose on them.

In possession of a rich, extensive, and unsettled country, the labor of the United States is not yet sufficient for the full cultivation of its soil, and consequently but a very small portion of it can have been applied to manufactures. Articles of the first necessity and comfort are imported in exchange for provisions and for those raw materials which are the growth of the country, and which its inhabitants are accustomed to raise. It is at any time extremely difficult, nor is it practicable without great loss, to change suddenly the habits of a whole people, and that course of industry in which the state of their population and their real interests have engaged them.

An agricultural cannot suddenly and at will become a manufacturing people; the United States cannot instantaneously, on the mere passage of a decree, transfer to the manufacture of articles heretofore imported such a portion of their labor as will at the same time furnish a market for the surplus commodities, and a supply for the wants of the cultivator of the soil. It is therefore scarcely possible for them to surrender their foreign commerce.

Independent of the right they possess, in common with others, to search for and choose the best markets, it is believed that the supplies they need could, with difficulty, in the actual state of the world, be completely furnished without the aid of England and its possessions. It is not pretended that France manufactures at present for foreign consumption; nor do the undersigned suppose that there exists a market where the citizens of the United States can obtain in exchange the articles they need and are accustomed to consume, if those coming out of England and its possessions be entirely excluded.

A variety of other considerations, and especially the difficulty individuals must encounter in suddenly breaking old and forming new connexions, in forcing all their commerce into channels not yet well explored, in trading without a sufficient capital to countries where they have no credit, combine to render almost impossible an immediate dissolution of commercial intercourse between the United States and Great Britain.

If, then, the decree complained of shall be executed on American vessels, it can only increase grievances already but too considerable, and transfer the carriage of English manufactures for American consumption from their own to British bottoms, sailing under the protection of a convoy. Instead of wounding England, it will probably aggrandize its marine by sacrificing the remnant of that of the United States, and by destroying that system of policy by which they have heretofore sought to give their own vessels that portion of their own carrying trade which would otherwise be enjoyed by British merchants.

A very essential object of the mission with which the undersigned are charged is to obtain a cessation of hostility against the commerce of their country. While, under circumstances of painful humiliation, they are soliciting this cessation, a decree is passed, the necessary tendency of which is nearly to destroy that which they are deputed to save.

They can no longer resist the conviction that, under existing circumstances, the demands of France render it entirely impracticable to effect the objects of their mission.

Not being permanent ministers, but envoys extraordinary, with full powers for particular purposes, they deem it improper to continue in Paris after the impossibility of effecting those purposes has been demonstrated. A due respect for the Government of the United States commands them to retire from France until the Government of the French Republic shall be willing to consider and receive them as the representatives of their country, and shall be willing to enter upon an amicable discussion of the subjects of difference which unhappily subsists between the two nations. America has uniformly displayed, in a manner not to be misunderstood, too much solicitude for this discussion, and for the accommodation which might result from it, to render it necessary for the undersigned to give any assurances of the promptness with which they would themselves return from any part of Europe for the purpose, or with which any fit occasion for entering on it will be embraced by the United States.

They now request that passports for leaving France may be furnished them; and beg leave to add, that they are induced to this measure only by the conviction that their longer continuance in this Republic, while its Government refuses to hear or to accredit them as ministers, would be improper, unavailing, and inconsistent with the dignity of the United States. They trust, therefore, that their departure, which has become indispensably necessary, will not be considered as in any degree detracting from that earnest wish for reconciliation with France of which the Government of the United States has given so many proofs, and which it will still continue to feel.

Accept, Citizen Minister, the assurances of their respectful consideration.

CHARLES C. PINCKNEY.
J. MARSHALL.

No. 319.

Extract from a document, marked A, received with letter No. 7 of Messrs. Pinckney, Marshall, and Gerry, dated Paris, March 9, 1798, addressed to the Secretary of State.

"He [Mr. Talleyrand] observed that we had claims on the French Government for property taken from American citizens. Some of those claims were probably just. He asked, if they were acknowledged by France, whether we could not give a credit as to the payment—say for two years? We answered that we could. He then insisted that it was precisely the same thing; that, by such an act, we should consent to leave in the hands of France funds to which our citizens were entitled, and which might be used in the prosecution of the war. General Pinckney said there was a difference between the cases; that such prizes were now actually in the power of the French without our consent; we could not prevent it or get them out; but the granting or not granting a loan was in our own power. He repeated his observation; and General Marshall said that the property for which money was due to American citizens from the French Government was taken into the possession of that Government without any co-operation on the part of the United States. No act, of any sort, was performed by our Government which, in any degree, contributed to place those funds in the hands of France, nor was there any consent towards it; but, in the case proposed, the act would be the act of the Government; the Government would, itself, place funds in the hands of France, and thereby furnish means, which might be employed in the prosecution of the war. This was the distinction between the cases, and, in a question of neutrality, it appeared to us to be all important. The minister then proceeded to state the case of our assuming the debt of our citizens, and of paying the money in that manner; but General Pinckney and Mr. Gerry told him we were positively forbidden to assume the debt to our own citizens, even if we were to pay the money directly to them. He seemed surprised at this.

"General Pinckney observed that, contrary to usage, we had deemed it proper, in the existing state of things, to state candidly our powers to him, that he might know, certainly, that we could not secretly, or under any disguise whatever, make a loan which might be used during the war. Mr. Talleyrand said, he must resume his position, that there was a difference, which he must insist upon, between a loan payable immediately, and a loan payable in future; and he still insisted there was no difference between a loan payable in future, and a credit for the money which might be due to our citizens. Mr. Gerry observed that his colleagues had justly stated the distinction between the debt which will be due to the citizens of the United States from France, in case of her recognizing the claims which we shall make in their behalf, and a debt which might arise from a loan by the Government of the United States to that of France during the war. The one is the result of an arrest of their property without their consent, and the other would be a voluntary act of the Government of the United States, and a breach of their neutrality. There is an additional objection to the latter; if the United States should make such a loan it would give too much reason to suppose that their Government had consented, in a collusive manner, to the capture of the vessels of their citizens, and had thus been furnishing France with supplies to carry on the war. Our instructions are express, not to stipulate for any aids to France, either directly or indirectly, during the war. With respect to a secret stipulation, a loan cannot be made without an act of the Legislature; but, if the Executive were adequate to it, we have had an instance of an injunction of secrecy on members of the Senate, on an important subject, which one of the members thought himself warranted in publishing in the newspapers, and of frequent instances of secrets which have otherwise escaped; secrecy, in this instance, might, therefore, be considered, if the measure was, in itself, admissible, as being impracticable. General Marshall observed that we had considered the subject with great solicitude, and were decidedly of opinion that we could not, under any form, make a loan which could be used during the war; that we could not tell what our Government would do if on the spot; but were perfectly clear that, without additional orders, we could not do what France requested."

"You suppose that the 2d article of the treaty between France and the United States justifies the arrêtés of which the latter power complains. But that article only entitles either of the contracting parties to a participation of any particular favor in respect of commerce or navigation, which might, thereafter, be granted by the other to other nations, on allowing the same compensation, if the concession was conditional.

"It has never been pretended to extend to pre-existing rights held and exercised under the law of nations, and barely recognized by any subsequent treaty.

"If this could be insisted on still, it was shown incontestably by the undersigned that the arrêté particularly complained of, so far as it professes to found itself on the treaty with England, greatly transcends that treaty; and, in its most noxious article, that requiring a rôle d'équipage, has no relation to it.

"This all-essential circumstance you have not been pleased to notice, and it is with infinite regret the undersigned observe that the discussions at which you hint are to be limited to the abuses of the principle established by the arrêté, and not extended to the compatibility of the principle itself with justice, the laws of nations, or existing treaties.

"It is well known that such a discussion, if indeed the undersigned could be permitted to enter upon it, could avail but little, since the vast mass of American property, captured by the cruisers, and condemned by the courts of France, has been found in vessels not furnished with a rôle d'équipage."

Exterior Relations, Paris, 16th Thermidor, 6th year of the French Republic, (August 3, 1798.)

The Minister of Exterior Relations to Mr. Gerry, Envoy of the United States:

Presuming, sir, that you have not yet embarked, I address to you a decree of the Executive Directory, wherein you will find a part of the measures which I announced to you the fourth of this month. Its solicitude will not be confined to that. Neutrals, in general, will have reason soon to be convinced of its firm attachment to the principles to which it is desirous that all the maritime nations might agree. It depends upon the United States in particular to cause every misunderstanding immediately to disappear between them and the French Republic.

Accept, sir, the assurance of perfect consideration.

PARIS, 19th Thermidor, An. 6me. (August 6, 1798.)

CITIZEN: You have seen, in the 961st number of the Redacteur, a copy of an arrêt taken by the Directory to make privateers observe the rules and restrictions beyond which they should never have gone.

By this measure, foreign powers will be convinced that the Executive Directory, informed of the abuses that may be directed against them, makes use of every exertion to put a stop to them, and prevent a recurrence of them.

You will see, beyond a doubt, in the intentions and acts of the Directory, a motive to effect the commercial security of your fellow-citizens, as long as it shall be kept within just limits.

The welfare of the two countries, citizen, induces me to wish that the conduct of the Federal Government corresponds with that of the Directory. Agreeably to this hypothesis, the amicable relations of both nations will soon be re-established.

PARIS, the 24th Thermidor, 6th year, (August 13, 1798.)

I remark, citizen, by the correspondence of the greater part of the governors of the ports, that the embargo laid recently upon American vessels has produced the detention of their crews. The intentions of Government have been ill understood, by the adoption of a measure that, in the first place, compromits the safety of those vessels, and in the second, seems to place us in a hostile attitude against the United States; when, on the contrary, the acts of Government evince the desire to maintain a good understanding between the two Republics. You are therefore required by me, citizen, to order, on the receipt of these presents, the discharge of all American prisoners, who might have been considered as prisoners of war, in consequence of the detention of their vessels.

You will give me, speedily, an account of the execution of this order.

Our political situation with regard to the United States, citizen, not having undergone, up to this day, any change that might have an influence upon the attentions due to neutral nations, I think it unnecessary to bring to your recollection that no attempt should be made against the security and liberty of persons composing the (Etats-Majors) officers and (equipages) crews of every American vessel that is found regular, and that the same course should be observed towards all passengers and other citizens of the United States furnished with passports or necessary protections. You will use the strictest vigilance that the intentions of Government, in this respect, be followed by all persons under your command, and if any of them have failed in the due execution thereof, you will do justice to the demand which will be addressed to you, as soon as you shall have ascertained their validity.

PARIS, 3d Fructidor, 6th year of the French Republic, (August 20, 1798.)

I send you, sir, copies of two letters written by the Minister of Marine to all the principal officers, civil and military, of the ports of the Republic.

Their contents will prove to you the attention of the Government to remedy the abuses committed against its intentions.

With respect to the persons detained in the civil prisons of Orleans, because they are not possessed of papers to prove that they are not English, and who claim to be Americans, be pleased to call upon the Minister of General Police, to whose functions belong all the measures of safety.

The Minister of Marine informs me that he has transmitted their petition to him, and I am going to write to him myself, in order to request him to admit your declaration in their favor, in the absence of other proofs.

No. 22.—Mr. Skipwith, Consul General of the United States, to the Secretary of State of the United States, dated Paris, January 23, 1799.

SIR: As every circumstance expressive of the present disposition or intentions of this Government towards neutral nations in general and the United States in particular must, at the present juncture, prove acceptable to our Government to know, I hasten to transmit you a copy of the message lately addressed to the Council of Five Hundred, by the Directory, concerning the actual system of privateering. The object of that message is, first, to place in the hands of Government the immediate control of all prize business, instead of the commercial and civil tribunals; and, from the evident necessity of repressing the violence and rapacity of French privateers, I have reason now to think that the system suggested by the Directory will be soon approved by the Legislature, and that, in consequence, the rights and property of neutral nations will be considerably more respected than they have hitherto been. In hope, as I am also, of this change proposed by Government of the mode and principles of judging prizes, proving favorable to some, if not all the American vessels lately captured and now under trial, I deem it expedient to follow where I am charged with the defence of such vessels, and to recommend to all others charged with the same the system of procrastination.

I deem it not uninteresting also to enclose to you, under cover hereof, an exact translation of a letter lately provoked by me from the Minister of Foreign Relations to the Minister of Justice, in consequence of some representations which I had just before made of the absurd and iniquitous application of the laws and arrêtés concerning the rôle d'équipage, which shamefully continue to be practiced by many of the tribunals. I beg to observe that the copy of the letter above alluded to was privately procured and furnished me by Mr. Victor Dupont, formerly French Consul at Charleston, and whose aid and zeal in rendering my countrymen service I cannot too much commend. At this gentlemen's request, I likewise transmit to you an example of a letter lately published and written by him to the Commissary of the Directory near the tribunal of cassation on the subject above mentioned.

I enclose to you at the same time a copy of a declaration made by three American seamen before the American Consular Agent at Ostend, concerning the loss of the ship Polly, Captain Stewart, and her cargo, near that port and on their passage from New York to Hambro; and at foot you have the names of American vessels which have been captured by French privateers and brought into ports since my last respects.

Respectfully, I have the honor to be, sir, your most humble servant,

No. 340.

Mr. Pickering, Secretary of State of the United States, to Mr. Skipwith, Consul General of the United States at Paris, dated Philadelphia, June 10, 1799.

[Extract.]

"You speak very justly of 'the violence and rapacity of French privateers, and of the iniquitous application of the laws and arrêtés which shamefully continue to be practiced by many of the tribunals;' you would have spoken still more justly had you called the laws and arrêtés themselves iniquitous. These are the sources, the shameful sources, of the 'violence and rapacity of the French privateers,' and of the 'iniquitous' decisions of their tribunals. And it is not because the Directory wish to stop those fountains of iniquity that, in their message to the Council of Five Hundred, (which you have enclosed,) they propose that judgment in the last resort should belong to themselves. In their message they describe the injury which arises to France by its system of privateering; and hence, not from any regard to justice and the rights of neutral nations, they intimate their wishes that power might be vested in the Directory to relax the execution of their iniquitous laws and arrêtés, when political motives may indicate such relaxation. In other words, that they may plunder, or forbear to plunder, a neutral nation, as they shall think terror or soothing may best promote their views.

"Other motives may easily be imagined of the wish of the Directory to get into their own hands the ultimate decision of prize causes.

"The letter of the Minister of Foreign Relations (of which you sent me a translation) to the Minister of Justice, relative to the rôle d'équipage, is valuable for its confession that our treaty with France did not require it. Mr. Dupont's letter to the Directorial Commissary, with the tribunal of cassation, truly states that it was a document unknown in the United States, when the decree of the 2d of March, 1797, declared that every American vessel destitute of it should be good prize. I trust we shall not know it hereafter but as a monument of French rapacity and injustice, and that ultimately we shall not consent that France shall arbitrarily prescribe what documents our vessels shall be furnished with to identify their character and the property of their cargoes. If justice ever again revisits her tribunals, such proofs of property as our own laws and principles of right universally admitted shall prescribe will be admitted to establish the claims of our captured vessels.

"Mr. Dupont, in his letter before mentioned, has made some very just reflections; but if he desires the least credit for any efforts he may make to obtain right and justice for the citizens of the United States, let him retract his insult on their Government, and let him no more say that it is 'influence par les conseils, les intrigues, et la conduite astucieuse de l'Angleterre.' He has been too long a resident in the United States, and is too well acquainted with the character and principles of its Government and the men who administer it, to believe that such an 'influence' exists or has ever existed. In addressing that sentiment to the Directory's Commissary, he has made a sacrifice to their power, and that and similar sacrifices may be necessary to secure or to promote his interest with that power; but being capable of making them, he can look, whatever in other respects may be his disposition, for no regard on this side of the Atlantic. We are not inclined to receive a benefit at the expense of truth and honor."

No. 22.] PARIS, the 22d Frimaire, 7th year, (December 13, 1799.)

DEAR COLLEAGUE: The Consul General of the United States has transmitted me a copy of the letter he addressed to you the 4th instant, relative to the American vessel The Polly, taken and brought into Bordeaux by the privateer The Bonaparte. He has, at the same time, informed me of your wishing to know my opinion on the matter therein treated.

The question, my dear colleague, is this, whether the rôle d'équipage of an American ship, in order to be valid, must be conformable to the maritime regulations of the Republic, or to the treaty of commerce, concluded in 1778, between France and the United States? In my mind, dear colleague, the conformity of the rôle d'équipage to the regulations must be alone sufficient. To support the contrary opinion, the treaty itself should prescribe a rôle d'équipage to the American vessels.

You know to what controversies that question of the rôle d'équipage has given birth, when the arrêt of the 12th Ventose obliged for the first time the Americans to furnish themselves with that piece. The different tribunals did not agree on the point, and the Government itself was not of the same opinion at different times.

According to the fourth article of the prescribed arrêté, it is in consequence of the old regulations that the Americans are obliged to have a rôle d'équipage conformable to the treaty. The Consul General of the United States, then the only authority in Paris from the United States, complained of that arrêt, and all the strength of his arguments tended to prove that the treaty not prescribing a rôle d'équipage to the vessels of his nation, they could not be held to that formality in virtue of our laws.

In his answer of the 4th Floreal, 5th year, the Minister of Justice, your predecessor, tries to confute that induction, and to prove, by reasoning and examples, that the silence of the treaty on the subject of a rôle d'équipage does not prevent the effects of the regulations, which in a formal manner put the neutrals under the obligation of being furnished with that piece.

Here are, as you see, in each case, a contradictory doctrine; in the arrêt, to prescribe a rôle d'équipage on board, the regulation is invoked, and for its forms, the treaty, which at least implies the supposition, that the rôle is prescribed by the treaty. In the ministerial letter, the treaty only is cited, and in both cases it is agreed, at least impliedly, that the treaty keeps an absolute silence on a rôle d'équipage being on board the American vessels. The most considerable opinions given on that matter rolled within this circle of contradictions. The treaty, indeed, does not prescribe the presence of a rôle, but it is there impliedly supposed; in every case, the regulations bind the American to have it, and its form is found in the model of passport annexed to the treaty.

To endeavor to conciliate those opinions, and reduce them to a basis by which the practice could be directed, would be a very hard task; but it seems natural to conclude, from all this, that we acknowledge that the Americans are not bound by the treaty to have on board their vessels an expedition of that list signed and certified by two witnesses, which list, according to the test of the passport annexed to the treaty, they must have remitted to the marine officers of the place of departure, acknowledge that the treaty does not prescribe that list. Take out of the treaty the obligation for the American to have a rôle, and then pretend that the list mentioned in the treaty must be the model of that rôle, is it not a manifest intention to find infringers everywhere, and trust the equity, which after all must be a guide when no positive law is against it?

A rôle d'équipage on board has been demanded of the Americans; where was that obligation taken? In the regulations; then they must have opened those regulations and conformed themselves to them, in order to escape the confiscation. So they did, and now-a-days they would be condemned for so having done.

They would be condemned for not having done the thing according to formalities, whose obligation appeared dubious, and which afterwards was confessed not to exist. The clearest point on the matter is, that the regulations have totally taken the place of that part of the treaty and explained it; which part at least wants to be cleared, and will undoubtedly be, when the friendly relations between the two countries are renewed; until that time, to be just and to agree with ourselves, we must confine our reasonings in the regulation of which we have made a law to the Americans.

This is, dear colleague, the manner in which I consider the question. I shall add, that it is not in the moment when the Directory is together, the fruits of the conciliatory measures they have taken to prevent hostile combinations between England and America, it would be politic to support the new difficulty raised up by our privateers, which, if consecrated, (and it could not be but by authority, and by no means after the spirit nor the meaning of the laws of treaties,) would occasion numbers of new confiscations, and revive in the United States the general discontent, hitherto the greatest, and I could say, the only force of the American Government against us.

No. 342.

Exterior Relations, third division, Paris, the 29th Thermidor, year 9, (August 17, 1801.)

[Translation.]

The Minister of Exterior Relations to Citizen Callet Descoutils, member of the Council of Prizes, performing, ad interim, the functions of Commissary of Government, near the council.

The motives, citizen, which had rendered necessary the postponement of every decision upon American prizes have at length ceased to exist. The convention concluded between the French Republic and the United States on the 8th Vendemiaire last, has been ratified by both powers, and the exchange of ratifications concluded on the 12th of this month. I send you a copy of this convention; you will receive it printed, presuming that it will be more agreeable to the council to have it under that form.

The convention had in view, not only the termination of the misunderstanding that had taken place between the two nations, but also to repair, as far as possible, the injuries to which it has given existence. It has, therefore, stipulated as well for the future as for the past, by embracing in the past the whole period previous to the exchange of ratifications. As regards the future, it has determined the relations which should exist between the two nations. It has created in their favor a particular right, to the rules whereof all differences that shall arise must at the time be submitted. Concerning the past, it could not change the relations which had existed between both nations, or the right from which they of necessity proceeded.

This right must consequently be either in force in favor of, and at the risk of, the contracting parties, or all pretensions thereto must be mutually relinquished; the last condition they adopted.

That which had been previously decided was held irrevocable; and that which was undecided was settled by the convention itself. It declared null, void, and of none effect, all that, (with but a single exception,) up to the exchange of ratifications, had been or could be a legitimate cause of seizure and confiscation.

Although the two powers have not yet been able to agree upon the treaty of 1778, and that for this reason it is of no effect as regards the present, they, notwithstanding, were desirous to renew, respecting prizes already made, and not condemned, or those that shall be made before the exchange of ratifications, a principle made sacred by the following treaty, and which has in like manner been rendered inviolable by the 14th article of the new convention, to wit: That a free ship makes free goods, even of an enemy, when on board. The two nations have accordingly guarantied the one to the other the restitution—

1. Of national ships.

2. Of armed or unarmed ships that shall be known to belong to their citizens, according to the proofs specified in the 4th article, and that without any exception, restriction, or reserve.

3. Of all property forming part of the cargo of said ships, with the only exception of merchandise specified by the 13th article, under the denomination of contraband of war, and which shall be destined for the enemy. The Council of Prizes required me to ask, in Brumaire last, if in the restitution of American armed ships were to be included those which shall have refused to obey on being summoned, and to permit a search; those even that shall have given battle; and those whose crews shall have on board revolted against French citizens.

Although it was evident to me that no exception could be made, as the convention made none, I communicated the demand of the council to the French plenipotentiaries. The letter which they wrote to me on this subject, a copy whereof I hereto annex, leaves no doubt as to the true spirit of the convention, and obligations which grow out of it. Restitutions have not been agreed upon, but to be advantageous. They will be the less so the more they are delayed. By great delays they may even become delusive, and thereby furnish the Americans with a pretext to demand indemnities of Government. You will therefore solicit the council to apply, as soon as possible, the provisions of the convention to American prizes in all that relates to them.

CH. MAU. TALLEYRAND.

No. 343.

Mr. Skipwith, United States Consul at Paris, to Mr. Livingston, Minister of the United States to France, dated Paris, December 19, 1801.

SIR: I have thought that the subjoined sketch would be sufficient to give you an idea of the nature of such claims of our countrymen upon the French Government as have been for a long time deposited in my office in order that I might pursue the payment of them.

Some, as you will see, are liquidated; some in part; others are yet in suspense, but are submitted to the different administrations which they concern; others could not be maintained for want of sufficient or authentic documents, or because they were of such a nature that diplomatic negotiations could alone determine their degree of validity; in short, all have been thrown into what is called Arrièré, where they may remain forever dormant, without the intervention of the Government of the United States through you.

The scarcity of 1793 and 1794 obliged France to give orders to her ships-of-war and privateers to stop all vessels of our nation found loaded with provisions, and conduct them into their ports. Many of them that were put into requisition have not yet been paid for; some have been at very low prices, and the vessels have generally been detained six, eight months, and more, in the hope, often vain, of their payment.

The proprietors of these vessels have incontestible rights to indemnities proportionate to the time of their detention, as also for the expenses occasioned by the long residence of the captains and crews, and the injury and repairs of their vessels. These indemnities, (of which some few are liquidated,) joined to what remains due for cargoes delivered by contract or taken forcibly by the Government, form a considerable branch of the debt, the legitimacy of which cannot be disputed.

There may be also ranged in this class a number of cargoes furnished by our merchants in the French West India islands, and which have not yet been paid in any kind of value.

A branch of debt not less sacred, nor less incontestible, is that which is composed of bills given by the Administrators, Governors, or other French agents, in payment of supplies afforded by Americans in the French colonies, particularly at St. Domingo. Of these bills drawn upon the National Treasury, or upon the Department of Marine at Paris, the greatest part have not yet been acquitted; and those which I have in my possession amount to about one million and a half.

Our vessels have been at different periods detained in the ports of France by embargoes, which the Government conceived necessary for its security or projects. Considerable losses have thereby resulted to the proprietors, for which they demand to be indemnified—a demand as natural as well founded.

There is also a numerous class of reclamations on which some difficulties may arise in consequence of the interpretation the French Government has been pleased to give to the suppression of the 2d article of the convention. This is composed of the vessels captured by the French privateers in the East and West Indies, and condemned by the Tribunals of Commerce, and oftentimes by Governors and Commanders of the different colonies.

No one is ignorant of the fury with which those privateers have harassed our commerce, and the facilities they have had from the constituted authorities to appropriate to themselves the vessels and cargoes belonging to our citizens that unfortunately fell in their hands.

The ignorance of the French laws, the distance from the seat of Government, have been the cause that the interested here, generally speaking, have not appealed from these judgments, and have contented themselves to prove by protest the spoliations of which they have been the victims.

It is necessary to decide whether or not these judgments are to be considered valid. As to the subdivision traced out in the extract of your instructions which you have been pleased to communicate to me, I shall take the liberty to refer to the list of the judgments rendered by the Council of Prizes which I have presented to you. The dates will suffice to point out to you the judgments rendered since the 30th September, 1800. A few vessels only have been judged since your arrival, or some days previous to it. I have already called your attention to the fate of the Rodolph, Frederick, and Winyaw, whose judgments appear to me an infraction of the treaty. Those which the council has lately condemned, the Ann and Commerce, confirm the judgments rendered in Spain by the French Consuls. These Consuls, upon the prohibition made to them by Admiral Bruix, then cruising upon the coasts of Spain, and at the same time Minister of the Marine, refused to admit the appeals of the captured, who had this refusal verified by our Consuls in Spain.

The privateersmen alleged that the appeal not having been made during the time prescribed, the right no longer existed; and notwithstanding the proof that the appeal was interdicted, the Council of Prizes have confirmed these judgments. Many are still in the same situation, and it is to be feared the same fate attends them.

If any of our vessels have fallen into the power of the corsairs without a legal judgment, they have not come to my knowledge, no more than the prizes posterior to the 30th September, 1800. I shall have the honor to communicate to you what I may learn on this subject.

The moment approaches, without doubt, when the French Government, just towards neutrals, and particularly towards Americans, will repair wrongs which must be attributed to the force of circumstances, and will acquit debts thus sacred. May your influence hasten this moment, and procure to our injured countrymen, creditors of France, a mode of payment which will compensate for the hardships of so long a delay.

FULWAR SKIPWITH.

No. 344.

Citizen Claret, Fleurieu, and Roederer, to the Minister of Exterior Relations of the French Republic.

[Translation.]

PARIS, 21*st Frimaire*, 9. (12*th December*, 1801.)

We have the honor to reply to the letter which you addressed to us on the 16th of this month (7th December instant,) on the subject of the difficulties that were communicated to you by the Council of Prizes on the application of the 4th article of the treaty of the 8th Vindemiaire to American vessels that were taken after having resisted.

The intention of the treaty is to effect a general restitution of all property acknowledged as American or as French which, at the time of the signature, was not condemned. The text to accomplish this object has announced the proofs of property that would be exacted on board merchant vessels, and afterwards on board armed vessels.

This distinction was necessary on account of the almost hostile state of the two nations, which all at once succeeded a state of perfect neutrality. The restitution of the last class of vessels, it is believed, was amply provided for by the clause which states that proof of property, with respect to other than merchant ships, shall be the commission which they bear.

Nothing is more clear and more positive than this passage; and it is evident that every ship carrying a French or American commission should thereby be restored.

As to the general principles relative to the summons without combat, which seem to have led to doubts that arise relative to the execution of this clause, although they cannot restrain a stipulation so general, it may be thought that by a false application they are brought into the case now under consideration.

In fact, the principles of maritime right, which require the condemnation of a vessel that fights or refuses to obey the summons, are understood only of neutral ships—they do not apply to enemy ships; and the resistance implying delinquency in the forms naturally proceeds from the state of the latter. American armed ships were the bearers of hostile commissions directed against us. This measure placed them on a footing with enemy ships. They cannot, therefore, be considered as ships entirely neutral; and by consenting to restore them, we have not departed from the practice, so early in its execution, observed in all the treaties of this country. You will moreover observe, with propriety, that this is the only point upon which the article of restitutions should produce effects truly reciprocal; and that if resistance could be made against American vessels it would equally be so by the United States against armed French ships taken by them from us; our intention notwithstanding was, by the clause of the 4th article, which we have just cited, to make sure the restoration of these vessels to their owners.

Mr. Pickering, Secretary of State of the United States, to Messrs. Ellsworth and Davie, marked "private," and dated Trenton, October 26, 1799.

GENTLEMEN: At Mr. Bingham's request I enclose a letter from Count Noailles, addressed to his sister at Paris, which the Count begs you to deliver.

In the pamphlet containing communications from General Pinckney, and in the despatches of the three envoys, you will see their proceedings preparatory to their expected reception.

According to the usual course, you will first wait on the Minister of Foreign Affairs, make yourselves known, and give him a copy of your letter of credence. He will take the orders of the Directory for the day on which they will receive you. When admitted, you will present to them the sealed letter of credence from the President.

At the first interview of Foreign Ministers, in ordinary cases, there is an exchange of expressions of good will and desire to maintain harmony between the two countries. In your case they will naturally glance at existing differences, a hope of adjusting them, and restoring peace and friendship. You will know, far better than I can suggest, how far you should go in this way; but I should be inclined to reserve, not to be absolutely cold, but certainly not warm and eager. The actual state of things, besides, at the moment, must be taken into the account.

I am, gentlemen, with sincere respect and esteem, your obedient servant,

T. PICKERING.

The Minister of Exterior Relations of the French Republic to Messrs. Ellsworth and Davie, dated Paris, January 31, 1800.

GENTLEMEN: I have received the letter dated from Corunna which you did me the honor to write to me. I exceedingly regret that a tedious and painful voyage should have so long retarded your arrival in France. You are expected with impatience; you shall be received with eagerness. The form given to your letters of credence will be no obstacle to opening the negotiations, of which I dare foretell the happy success. I have hastened to transmit to Mr. Murray the letter you addressed to me for him, and added the necessary passports, in like manner as I enclose those of which you stand in need. I confide this packet, agreeably to your wish, to the courier you sent me.

Receive, gentlemen, the assurance of my high consideration.

Letter from the Minister of Exterior Relations of the French Republic to Messrs. Ellsworth and Davie.

[Translation.]

PARIS, 13*th Vindemiaire*, 9*th year of the French Republic, (October* 5, 1800.)

The Minister of Exterior Relations of the French Republic to Messrs. Ellsworth and Davie, Ministers Plenipotentiary of the United States, at Paris.

GENTLEMEN: I take the liberty of requesting of you the favor to take charge of the enclosed packet, directed to Citizen Letombe, who now, at the United States, fills the office of Commissary General of the Republic for Commercial Relations. The packet contains the copy of the convention; and Citizen Letombe receives therein the necessary instructions to issue commercial commissariats as soon as the Federal Government shall have ratified the convention.

I find it not necessary, gentlemen, to observe, that Citizen Letombe has received orders not to precede the Government of the United States in the publication of the treaty.

The Government intends to send despatches immediately to the colonies where it is most requisite that its signature should be known. I am about the necessary arrangement for this object, with the Minister of Marine. In the mean time, I have deemed it proper to avail myself of the opportunity presented by your frigate to enable Citizen Letombe to transmit the information to those places. The instructions to be sent there will be conformable to the spirit and to the letter of the convention, and to those sentiments, of which proofs have been given by the First Consul. They will be sent without delay. On its part, the French Government confidently hopes that the United States will not hesitate to annul those relations which were formed with the colonies at the time of our misunderstanding; all of which led to discontent, as being contrary to usages and to treaties. It also entertains the hope that the Federal Government will be convinced of the propriety of ordering home those persons who, especially at St. Domingo, gave, by their conduct, just causes of complaint.

Receive, gentlemen, the assurance of my distinguished consideration.

C. MAU. TALLEYRAND.

No. 394.

Mr. Murray, commissioned to exchange the ratifications of the Convention of 1800, with France, to Citizen Pichon, Secretary of the French Legation at the Hague, dated The Hague, September 23, 1798.

Mr. Murray avails himself of that handsome frankness which has marked all Mr. Pichon's conversations on the disputes between the United States and the French Republic, to offer a few remarks on the message of the President. These, as were the several conversations, he assures Mr. Pichon, expressly, are unauthorized by his Government, and entirely the opinion of an individual who wishes to see an amicable and honorable termination, immediately, to the disputes between the two Republics.

The President, in his message of the 21st of June last, has declared to Congress that all negotiation is ended, and that he never will send another envoy to France unless he receives assurances that he will be received and treated with that respect which is due to the representative of a great, powerful, free, and independent nation.

This sort of reception is expected, as of common right, between sovereigns equal and independent. Why is a declaration that it shall be accorded necessary in this instance?

The language of the President seems to have a meaning appropriate to two things: the subject of some of the disputes, and the circumstances of offence, under which his endeavors to negotiate upon them have been defeated by the Government of the French Republic. Hence it is presumed he uses terms which, to be found appropriate, must be measured by those rights of sovereignty "independence," and "freedom," and those usages which are accorded to a nation, acknowledged to be "powerful," but which have not been accorded to the United States, and, on the contrary, have been publicly and expressly refused to her ministers.

Mr. M. then thinks that France ought, with frankness, to make an explicit declaration that she will receive any envoy whom the American Government may send to treat, and to give him a respectful reception, &c., &c.

The refusal and rejection of the American envoys on two occasions gives the Government of the United States a right to this explicit declaration. If it be out of the common track, so are the circumstances, which render it just in France to give it, and fit and becoming in the American Government to wait for it. Without it the President has said he will not attempt to negotiate.

At the time of the refusals the instructions were not known to the French Government. A misunderstanding may have existed as to the real dispositions of the American Government. Those instructions demonstrate the sincerity of the United States, with a precision and a frank development of policy, that must convince the French Government. It is remarkable, too, that since their publicity the spirit and views of France are more amicable.

If doubt was the basis of refusal, it would then appear to be no longer a sound one. France ought, then, to recur to an acknowledgment of a right, which is inherent in every sovereign nation, to be respectfully treated with when coming to treat with sincerity and good faith. What was refused under mistake ought to be given under a more enlightened conviction. A respectful reception is no favor, but a right; and an express declaration that this right shall be enjoyed becomes necessary only when it has been expressly refused. It has been twice refused; yet a subsequent conviction proves that it has been refused unjustly. It ought, one would suppose, then, to be expressly declared, and with a handsomeness equal in degree to the harshness with which it was denied.

Mr. Murray writes thus confidently to Mr. Pichon, he knows well, on a delicate subject. He protects himself, not from Mr. Pichon, whose delicacy he esteems and trusts, but from accident, by a solemn assurance that all he has said and written he has said and written as a private man unauthorized by his Government. He wishes Mr. Pichon health and prosperity in his career, and under the auspices of Mr. Talleyrand's very enlightened mind, he does expect important and mutually good consequences on the subject of this hasty paper.

He begs him to accept, with friendly recollection, his assurances of esteem, which are offered to him with cordiality.

No. 396.

Copy of a letter, marked "private," from Mr. Murray, Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States, to Mr. Pickering, Secretary of State of the United States, dated The Hague, October 12, 1798.

DEAR SIR: The enclosed paper I have the honor of submitting to your perusal, confidentially, for, as the informal interviews and conversations to which it relates and from which it springs were on my part unauthorized, I thought myself at liberty to promise Mr. Pichon, at first, that whatever paper he gave me should be so considered, and my motive, I hope, sir, will be apparent. In this way I thought I could get a sight of, and even possession of papers which might be of some service, if not now, at some other time. I have not, however, seen any that contained a concession which at all met the great and manifold evils and injuries of the United States.

The enclosed I have had the honor of sending a copy of to the President, with some remarks upon it.

Since, the more I have reflected, the more empty it appears to me. The renewal of "the ties of friendship" may have an allusion to what, for one, I hope can never be realized—a revival of the old treaty which has been so fairly got rid of, a piece of good fortune which money could not have purchased, and the like of which I do not remember to have happened in any other case of equal importance to any nation.

The enclosed was delivered to me from the French post on the 7th instant. Such as it is I thought it my duty to send it to you, sir, although one place has a little of "the British" in it, yet it is more free from that insult than any I have seen from the same hand. The assurances are not made in the manner which the message of the 21st June, I presume, indicated—"according to these bases"—are expressions that still seem to entangle the succeeding sentence, which else would be pretty explicit in the qualifying provisions mentioned in that letter of the 11th Fructidor; in that are these expressions: "The advantages which I have praised in him are common to all the Americans who have not a predilection for England. Can it be believed that a man who should profess hatred or contempt for the French Republic, or should show himself an advocate of royalty, could inspire the Executive Directory with an opinion in favor of the dispositions of the American Government?" These are "the rocks" which he says are "to be avoided." If these are "the bases," according to which he sanctions Mr. Pichon's declaration to me, "that any minister of the United States should be received respectfully," the assurances to the Secretary of Legation are yet entangled, informal also as they are in revolting conditions—revolting, because prescribed. Very frequently, before and after the letter of the 11th Fructidor, I had attempted to show Mr. P, under a belief that what I said would be transmitted to Mr. Talleyrand, that any affectation of prescribing, indicating, or advice, or hint, as to the sort of men whom the President ought to appoint, would be considered as a repetition of the most offensive conduct; that if they were sincere in wishing for negotiation, they must make up their minds to enter upon it upon the principles on which independent nations always do treat, and that they must not pretend to use any hint even upon this subject.

As I consider these small informal endeavors on my part now at an end, I would beg leave to remark a little, in justice to myself, upon what passed when Mr. P. first showed me the letter of 11th Fructidor, relatively to the first four or six lines at the beginning. When I had read to the words, the impressions "which the British cabinet has given against us," inclusively, I put down the letter and told him that I never could for a moment make any use whatever of a piece containing a passage so offensive. He begged me to go on; was sorry they were there; but that, if I would proceed, I would find that these expressions were but a burst of feeling against the British, whom they considered as having taken universal pains to hurt their reputation, and that I should find, by the subsequent sentences, that they could not be taken as intended in the sense I had taken them, for that Mr. T. said in the next sentence that Mr. M. was neither French nor British.

In truth, sir, though I trust that I was not caught by this truth, nor by the flattery of some of the expressions, yet it did so soften the passage and explain it, as to determine me in not rejecting the whole on that account. Hence I sent it.

As this is the last time, I hope, that I shall trouble you on this small subject, I will state the principal motives why I did anything at such a period of our affairs. The temper of the citizens in our country had demonstrated a deep-laid sensibility to the wrongs and insults which France had heaped on the Government and nation. That conviction appeared to me solid, not to be shaken by words; France had appeared to me, from March and April, to have dreaded a rupture, and relied, till May, on a powerful party in the United States. In proportion as we rose, she sunk, in her tone at least. I thought that if anything could be done that would lead them into any act which implicated them in an acknowledgment of error and injustice, it would be an important point for Government, whether negotiation or war followed. That if something of this sort could be gained, the United States were in a situation so strong, as to be free to choose to act in it or not. When the message of the 21st of June came, I thought I saw in it something to encourage that idea. I thought I saw in it this: we are strong, prepared for war, and determined to have it if we cannot have justice speedily. We shall make no more efforts to revive negotiation, "unless, &c., &c.;" so that I concluded it would be agreeable if a declaration conformable to the language of the President were properly made; that it would be agreeable to the President to have offers, explicit and respectful, come from France; that in the meantime all that I did was private, always under a solemn assurance of having no authority to open my lips; always, too, on the solicitations of Mr. Pichon for interviews, and merely as conversations; except that, before he went, the day before, I wrote the enclosed note, principally to protect myself on the ground of being unauthorized to talk or act in this subject with any one. Besides, sir, to you and to the President only have I written a word on it in America; to Mr. King but a hint confidentially; and to Mr. Adams, at Berlin, confidentially.

The total defeat of the French fleet near Alexandria is very important to us, as it diminishes the few means in their power to hurt us. The Russian fleet which passed the Dardanelles the first week last month passed under a particular convention between Russia and the Porte. Bonaparte's army has reached Cairo, and is believed to be greatly weakened and distressed.

I am, with great respect and sincere esteem, dear sir, faithfully yours, &c.,

DEAR SIR: I have just received the original official letter from Mr. Talleyrand, the Minister of Exterior Relations of the French Republic, in answer to mine of the 5th instant, written in conformity to your commands respecting the assurances, &c., &c., a copy of which I have the honor to enclose.

I have received it this evening. A vessel, I understand, sails immediately for Boston, and the post for Amsterdam goes so soon that I have time but to prepare a copy, and to assure you that I am, with the highest respect and esteem, dear sir, your most obedient servant, &c., &c., &c.,

"From what I can collect, there is no change since their (the French) knowledge of the late nomination on any one point that is in contact between the two Governments. None in the class of grievances under sea-letters and the rôle d'équipage, though they have not, that I can discover, in any case admitted the idea of the annulling of the late treaties and consular convention. Affecting still to act under these, they pursue the same system of gross violation, though they have published arrêtés which held up the idea that the rôle d'équipage arrêté of March, 1797, shall be restrained to a more just interpretation, and in analogy with that of 1748; but there is not, I believe, any alteration in practice."

[Extracts.]

"The enclosed report, made lately to the Consuls of the French Republic by their then Minister of Justice, Cambaceres, on the legislation of prizes, is so important in my eyes as to justify me in transmitting it by post through Mr. King.

"It is an official concession that may have good effects, that he should declare that, 'in a word, privateering had become brigandage,' and that the laws which regulated it were either 'inadequate or bad.' He declares the law of 29th Nivose (in 1798) to be at once 'vague and arbitrary;' but he is clear that 'enemy property, wherever found, is fair prize,' though they have treaties for free bottoms free goods. No arrêté of the Consuls has yet passed to reduce his plan of an appeal court into practice, but it is expected. This, I hope, will be done, as I have understood that many of the cases of our captured vessels have been suspended; and such, if this tribunal be well filled, (Cambaceres himself being now Second Consul,) may have a better chance than in tribunals where the Government could not, even if they had been inclined, exert official influence. Tribunals, however, can do nothing remedial; the laws and views of the Republic must be first changed. However, sir, as an official declaration on some points extremely interesting to us I consider this report as useful, and would have sent it sooner could I have obtained a copy

"Bonaparte's real intentions respecting Louis 18th cannot be judged of whether this be true or false. Monck, intending the restoration of Charles 2d, would probably have broken any independent plan which was to deprive him of the honor and profits of his own plan. Whatever may have been the more distant and less ostensible motive of the late event, I believe, sir, that it will tend to good, either as an intended preparation of things and opinions for the restoration, or as a most absolute abandonment of French revolutionary principles under the mask of republicanism! So far I do rejoice at it, having long ceased to view the revolution of France as an insulated national event; and having considered it as a question, in the solution of which, and its theories, the whole world were deeply interested."

"THE HAGUE, November 25, 1800.

"Enclosed is a duplicate of a private note which I had the honor to write the morning after the convention was signed, and which you will be pleased to consider private or official, agreeably to circumstances. Mr. Ellsworth, I hear, has landed in England. His health was very weak all the spring and a great part of the summer. I have a thousand reasons to wish that the original may have reached you before it be possible that Mr. Davie could have arrived. They left Havre the 19th October ultimo, and, by stopping in England, I fear the frigate may have been late in reaching America."

Copy of a note, marked "private," from William Vans Murray, Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States at The Hague, to the Hon. Mr. Marshall, Secretary of State, dated Paris, October 1, 1800.

SIR: An English agent settled here enables me to write by way of England, and to inform you, I hope the first, that last night we signed a provisional treaty with France. Indemnities which were impossible, together with the discussion about the abolished treaties and consular convention, to sleep till a more convenient time; and the restoration of unjudged cases, on very easy proof of neutrality, favor the principal objects.

I thought it might be useful that you should know that we have arranged amicably with France, and that possibly this note might reach you even before my colleagues, who will depart in three days.

I am, with sincere esteem, respectfully, sir, your obedient servant,

Mr. Murray, Minister of The United States at The Hague, to Mr. Madison, Secretary of State of the United States.

No. 134.] THE HAGUE, May 20, 1801.

SIR: To-day I had the honor to receive your letter of the 18th of March,* by which I am informed that it is the President's pleasure that I set off for Paris to exchange the ratifications of the convention between the United States and France, and to settle the ulterior points connected with that subject.

I shall obey the commands with which the President has honored me, and shall set out for Paris as soon as possible—I hope the day after to-morrow. Mr. Dawson will, as he informs me, deliver then the necessary official paper.

I regret that the departure of Mr. Ellsworth from England for America, of which my London letters of the 3d instant speak, deprives our country of the benefit of that superior judgment and knowledge which would have given greater confidence to my zeal.

If the article to be added be that of limitation for eight or ten years, there may be some objection and delay. Permit me, sir, to suggest to you the eventual utility there may be in giving me precise orders by which I may govern myself should that article produce some contingency like the following: That they would agree to strike out the article excepted to by the Senate, provided we would not press the limitation; or, that they agree to admit the limitation, if the 2d article be retained, on the ground that during the term they still have us under a treaty engagement to renew the negotiation on points interesting to their pride. Alternatives like these may be the pretexts for delay.

Against the admission of the new article, they will perhaps object that the policy secured by the 6th article of the convention is defeated; that the equality under it was obtained, in consideration of some other points of a temporary sort, and which will be accomplished in our favor before the expiration of the term to which we would limit the convention; that part of the stipulation in our favor, under the 4th article, has already been gratified; and that, though they would not pay for spoliations, yet that they consider the perpetuity of the 6th article as something in lieu of the exclusive perpetual privileges under the old treaty of commerce. This objection, to which I attach little solidity, if made and persisted in, may leave me in a difficult position.

You will pardon the solicitude which I feel in the wish that I may find as little as possible left to my discretion. The case may, and probably is, provided for in my instructions, which I have not seen.

Circumstances may be, as they have hitherto proved, rather favorable to us, particularly if it be true that they are to have the Floridas and Louisiana, as, in that case, there will exist a new temporary interest to be well with the United States; and they make a small sacrifice of pride to a solid and extensive plan, of which that cession, if made, will be the basis!

* From Mr. Lincoln, acting Secretary of State.

I am, with great respect, sir, your most obedient servant, &c., &c.,

Mr. Murray, commissioned to exchange the ratifications of the Convention of 1800 with France, to Mr. Lincoln, acting Secretary of State of the United States.

No. 1.] PARIS, June 1, 1801.

SIR: Having left the Hague the 22d, I arrived here the 28th ultimo in the evening.

The next day Mr. Dawson delivered to me the instructions, a letter of credence from the President to the First Consul, and a copy of the convention with the ratification by the President. Every account from London mentions the departure of Mr. Ellsworth for America.

On the same day I called upon Mr. Talleyrand. Not finding him at home I addressed No. 1 to him; and as he is much at Auteuil, I did not receive No. 2 till the 31st, when I sent No. 3, and to-day No. 4.

To-day at three I went to see him, agreeably to appointment. He received me politely; I stated to him that I came, by order of the President, to exchange the ratifications of the convention lately signed here, and begged him to name a day for that purpose, informing him that I had a copy of my letter of credence in my pocket. He informed me that Joseph Bonaparte, Fleurieu, and Roederer would see me on the subject, and said, on my pressing for an early day, that these gentlemen should receive instructions immediately to proceed on the business with me. I took this opportunity as the one intended to say to him that I was commanded by the President to request him to convey to his Government,* les assurances de l'amitie des Etats-Unis pour la France, et que le President saisira toutes les occasions pour lui temoigner ses dispositions de cultiver l'harmonie et la bonne intelligence, par une observance de toutes les attentions et de tous les procédés, fondés sur le respect et sur la justice, et qui sont enusage entre les nations, en tout ce qui pourrait arriver entre les deux Gouvernemens, et en donnant toujours les preuves d'une veritable amitié et de faveur, aiant egard à la justice due aux autres. He assured me that these sentiments were reciprocal on the part of the First Consul; as to the letter of credence, he observed that it would be proper to deliver it at the public audience on the 17th Prairial, the 6th instant. I informed him that the convention was in a course of execution in the United States in all its points; and that we expected no difficulty in the exchange, immediately after which a minister would come here. He repeated that the commission, Joseph Bonaparte, Fleurieu, and Roederer, would talk with me on the subject. If appearances without words can give a clue to what should be anticipated, I believe that they will accept the ratification, but will make some difficulties for the credit of apparent sacrifice on their part. The defeat of the northern coalition will doubtless operate in our favor. Had that succeeded, or even continued, new conditions had probably been held up as the price of their acceptance of the ratification.

Mr. Talleyrand, in parting, assured me that Joseph Bonaparte, as the head of the French commission, should be immediately written to; and on my urging an early day, he said the business should not suffer any longueurs.

They are crowded with negotiations. Count Cobenzl is much at Mortfontaine, treating, it is presumed, on the indemnities which rise out of the treaty of Luneville. Ministers from almost every State in Germany are here. These circumstances, and especially that Joseph Bonaparte, who is at the head of their commission for treating with the United States, is also their plenipotentiary to treat with Count Cobenzl, will, I fear, sir, throw some little delay [in the way.] I shall endeavor to hasten the exchange by every attention.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, sir, your most obedient, humble servant,

W. V. MURRAY.

No. 2.—Mr. Murray, commissioned to exchange the ratifications of the Convention of 1800 with France, to Mr. Lincoln, acting Secretary of State of the United States, dated Paris, June 9, 1801.

SIR: On the 6th, at a public audience, I delivered my letter of credence to the First Consul. He did not appear much pleased with the provisional ratification, but intimated that the exchange of ratifications would not meet with insurmountable difficulties. He expressed a great regard for the new administration of the United States.

On the same day Mr. Joseph Bonaparte informed me that, as President of the commission, with Fleurieu and Roederer, he had received instructions to enter upon the business of the exchange of ratifications.

Yesterday I received No. 5 from the French commission, and sent No. 6. I met these gentlemen at six, at Joseph Bonaparte's, and had a short conference with them before dinner. My object in asking for the conference was to inform them that I expected some official notification from their Government equivalent to full powers in them to enter on the business of the exchange. This I explained to them. They agreed in the propriety of the idea, and are, at the next meeting, to give me a certified copy of their powers, after my comparison of it with the original.

At this interview I entered no further into business than was necessary to show that the exhibition of their powers, to exchange or to treat, was necessary.

After dinner, Mr. Roederer made a remark which has excited some reflections. He observed that, by expunging the second article, we abandoned forever all claim to indemnity. I observed that, if that be the consequence, they could have no objection to our ratification. I fear that they will press an article of formal abandonment on our part, which I shall evade; as yet they have not made a grave objection to the additional article which I explained to them to belong to the general policy of our Government, and instanced the British, Prussian, and Swedish treaties.

As the Maryland's sailing is under the orders of Mr. Dawson, I have not presumed to detain her. I regret that I have nothing yet officially certain that can indicate the result.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, your most obedient servant,

W. V. MURRAY.

The undersigned Minister Plenipotentiary, authorized by the President of the United States of America to exchange the ratification of the convention signed at Paris on the 30th September last, 8th Vindemiaire, between the plenipotentiaries of the French Republic and of the United States, respectively, has the honor to enclose to the Minister Plenipotentiary of the French Republic a collated copy of the ratification of that convention by the President of the United States, together with a copy of his full powers upon the exchange.

The French Ministers Plenipotentiary will observe that, by the ratification on the part of the United States, the second article is not agreed to; and that a new article limiting the duration of the convention to eight years is added.

He wishes them to accede to this change; and flatters himself that they will perceive, in the wise modification of the act, a disposition on the part of his Government to render it more adequate to those views of amity and permanent concord which at present are so happily felt by both nations.

[Translation.]

The Ministers Plenipotentiary of the French Republic have received the copy of the powers and of the ratification of the convention of the 9th Vindemiaire, which Mr. Murray, Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States of America, has done them the honor to direct to them.

In order to accelerate the exchange of ratifications, and to sanction definitively the good understanding already re-established between the two nations, it is desirable that the American minister communicate to the French ministers the motives of reciprocal interest that induced the suppression by both of the 2d article.

They pray the American Minister Plenipotentiary to accept the assurance of their high considerations.

No. 12.—Mr. Murray, commissioned to exchange the ratifications of the Convention of 1800 with France, to Messrs. Bonaparte, Fleurieu, and Roederer, Ministers Plenipotentiary of the French Republic, dated Paris, June 15, 1801.

The undersigned, Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States of America, had the honor to receive the note of the Ministers Plenipotentiary of the French Republic of yesterday, and frankly assures them that he is uninformed by his Government of the motives which led to the suppression of the second article, and is absolutely uninstructed upon the object of their inquiry. Their question, however, is too interesting not to have engaged his serious attention, and he trusts that reflection will furnish reasons to show that its absence from the convention will tend to consolidate the amity and mutual prosperity of the two countries. He begs leave, then, to submit to them the following ideas which occur, as arising out of the nature and objects of the article in question.

Taking for a basis of the views of his Government a desire to fix harmony between the two countries, he thinks that the motives of its rejection may be found in the object of the article itself, considering it as possessed of qualities that must produce future inquietude, by promising nothing but an ulterior discordant negotiation; and in a wish to place friendship, reciprocally, rather upon a natural course of things than to hazard it upon an article which, if ever acted on, had an evident tendency to disturb it.

That article promised a negotiation upon treaties and mutual indemnities; and the two powers had under it not only a right, but were bound to negotiate in future upon them. These are precisely the things which, had the casus fœderis been claimed, must have tended to disturb the peace, and to throw the friendship of the two nations out of its natural course.

Is there a probability of convincing each other on the disputes connected with these objects, which had been thus laid up for future discussion? The patience and labors of the late negotiation leave little doubt upon the question.

This article being thus rejected and out of the convention, the act contains but defined objects of mutual good will and of easy accomplishment, bottomed on returning amity, commerce, and navigation. But it would have been to put all these three last great interests eventually on the issue of a future negotiation if the second article had remained in the instrument.

These reflections strike the undersigned as sufficiently strong to account for the rejection of that article, at the time when the American Government, however pure were found to be the motives of its ministers, negatived it.

He sees in that negative the outline of a policy at that time, therefore, better adapted to the ends of a steady and lasting amity than could have been counted on if the article had been ratified. To have retained it would have been, in the result, less to authenticate a claim to disputed rights than to lay up a future quarrel on points in which each party supposed itself just.

He takes this opportunity to remark, also, that the confidence of the American Government is proved by the execution of the convention in all its parts, independently of events; and he has great pleasure in giving this information to the French ministers. All hostilities on the sea have been forbidden; and the public ships must, before this day, have returned into port. The prisoners were in March last in a course of delivery to the Citizen L'Etombe, Commercial Agent of the French Republic; and he had been informed that all such officers might resume their functions. Commercial intercourse is restored, and the American vessels often arrive in the ports of France; and orders have been given for the restoration of ships under the third article.

It is in this state of things, and with these prospects of amity before the two nations, that the undersigned tenders to the Ministers Plenipotentiary of the French Republic the ratification of the convention, and requests them to accelerate the exchange.

He offers to the Ministers Plenipotentiary of the French Republic the assurance of his high consideration.

No. 3.—Mr. Murray, commissioned to exchange the ratifications of the Convention of 1800 with France, to Mr. Madison, Secretary of State of the United States, dated Paris, June 23, 1801.

Sir: On the 13th the French ministers gave me their full powers, a copy of which I have the honor to enclose, under No. 9. It appears from the text of these that some difficulties will arise from the change made by our ratification. They requested my full powers in exchange. I informed them that I had none but a copy of the letter of credence, which I delivered to the First Consul on the 6th, which was a full power. I read them the copy; they appeared to doubt if it were sufficiently special, and if it went further than to an authority merely to exchange the ratification. I attempted to convince them that it was adequate to all the purposes connected with the discussion of the business, as well as to a simple exchange. I then showed them the ratified copy of the convention, and as they assured me that they had not seen a copy before, I sent them verified copies of the ratification, and of my letter of credence, in No. 10.

I found that the objection to the suppression of the second article would be in this idea; that they thereby would resign their claim to the treaties, and yet not exonerate themselves from the claim of indemnities. I stated the substance of what I afterwards wrote in No. 12, in which an attempt is made to reconcile the suppression to a more generous policy, and to the interests of both nations, without pledging a formal abandonment of claims; fearing, as I did, that a word hazarded in pressing the suppression might have this effect at some future time. They had no right to demand the motives for the suppression of the second article, of which, also, I am not informed, nor could be from the nature of our Government; but from the attention which Joseph Bonaparte particularly paid to what was advanced for its suppression, on the ground of mutual amity, at the interview the 13th, I did suppose that the object of their inquiry in No. 11 was either to have a concession on my part of the point which I believe they wish, viz: that the suppression should be considered as an abandonment of indemnities, or to have a more fixed view of the general motives, as stated at the conference. I believe they would not hesitate if the indemnities were abandoned.

On the 18th and 19th I saw the French ministers. I could learn only that my note of the 15th was under consideration, but found that the abandonment, as they call it, of their treaties was still an obstacle. Mr. Roederer promised an answer very soon. On the 21st, at the audience, the First Consul expressed his doubts of the adequacy of my full powers to discuss and sign. I assured him, that though I had no powers but those which I had the honor to give him, my instructions enabled me to discuss and sign, and that the powers which I delivered were also, in substance, to that effect. Mr. Talleyrand remarked that it was but a letter from the President to the First Consul. I answered, it was a letter, but of credence, authorizing me to treat, as it was to take necessary measures for the exchange of the ratifications, and to take upon me the execution of that business, which was full power.

I called upon Mr. Joseph Bonaparte and Mr. Roederer that evening. The first was at his country seat, and the last was out. Count Cobenzl, at seven, had informed me, when I called on him to see a copy of the ratifications of the treaty of Luneville, that he and Joseph Bonaparte were to be at Mortefontaine the 22d and to-day. I had another object, also, in calling on the Austrian minister, which was, to know of him how his Court considered the question, which I find has been decided here, whether a consent of the Legislature were considered as a necessary sanction to the ratification? He informed me that they accepted the ratification by the First Consul as sufficient.

To-day, having yet no answer, I called on Mr. Fleurieu at the Council of State, and had a short conversation with him. I spoke of the extreme delay and the bad effects of it. He assured me that my note of the 15th was before the Minister of Exterior Relations, and that as yet they had not received their instructions. I then mentioned what had passed at the audience on my power, and expressed my astonishment that, if there was an objection, it had not been made by the French Commission. He spoke of not having yet instructions, but recommended, for the purpose of enabling them to move, that I should address a note to them on the subject. I said the objection ought to be first made, before an explanation could be expected, and that it was not agreeable to cite the words of a Chief Magistrate, as a motive of proceeding, as I spoke French badly; but that I would call on Mr. Talleyrand, which I did, and as he was not at home, I sent No. 13.

Until they present an obstacle officially to the acceptance of our ratification I do not consider myself as authorized to use the power given, as a last resort, on a second article. From the different conversations with the French ministers, I believe the new article will meet with little difficulty.

Dispositions are always warmly declared to cultivate amity and good intelligence, and that la chose s'arrangera. There is no appearance, also, of any acrimonious traces of the late disputes and hostile proceedings. As yet, sir, I cannot attribute the delay to any fixed intention. It seems to be the disease in all the negotiations carried on here.

A peace has been signed between Spain and Portugal. The terms are not known. Commodore Truxtun's squadron is greatly wanted in the Mediterranean to oblige Tripoli to respect our flag. Enclosed is a letter from Mr. Cathalan, Consul at Marseilles, to you, sir, and one to me, which I beg leave to recommend to your perusal.

I had the honor to receive your letter of the 23d of April on the 19th instant, and fear there has been a mistake in numbering, to account for No. 123.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, sir, your most obedient, humble servant,

SIR: From a conversation which I had to-day with one of the French plenipotentiaries, I believe that neither they nor their Government will consent to the unconditional suppression of the second article.

To-morrow I shall see two of the three together, and if possible Mr. Talleyrand also.

I send this by post to Havre, in the hope it may reach Captain Rodgers before he sails.

No. 5.—Mr. Murray, commissioned to exchange the ratifications of the Convention of 1800 with France, to Mr. Madison, Secretary of State of the United States, dated Paris, June 26, 1801.

SIR: Yesterday I had a conference with Messrs. Fleurieu and Roederer; Mr. Joseph Bonaparte having, as Mr. Fleurieu informed, authorized them to go on with the negotiation without him, should he be absent; and he was in the country. Mr. Talleyrand was out when I called.

I find, by their express declaration, that they are unanimous in refusing to accede to the suppression of the second article; and as they act by momentary contact with their Government, I must presume that the Government itself is of their opinion. Indeed they so informed me. They are to state their objection, immediately, in answer to my note of the 15th. I should not be surprised if they bring forward the idea, however, of a conditional suppression of the second article, with a proviso, that both parties in so many months declare their agreement to the total abandonment of the subject of that article, treaties, and indemnities.

To-day I had an interview with Mr. Talleyrand. By full powers, I understand they meant what is rather a matter of instructions than of full powers; to wit: whether I could exchange ratifications, should their ratification be conditional.

This solution confirmed me in what I concluded from the more general ideas which arose yesterday from the two ministers during the conference.

They are anxious to do something at once amicable, in their opinion, and compatible with the dignity of their Government, as Mr. Talleyrand expressed it to-day. I send this to Havre, hoping that Captain Rodgers may not yet have sailed, and with a wish that it may go in time to counteract the reports which are idly spread here among the Americans from half-informed people.

I am, with great respect, and with wishes, sir, for an agreeable career in the office which you fill,

Your most obedient, humble servant,

W. V. MURRAY.

[Translation.]

The Ministers Plenipotentiary of the French Republic have received the note which Mr. Murray, Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States of America, did them the honor to address to them on the 26th Prairial, (15th June.)

If the mutual relinquishment of the pretensions that have been the object of the 2d article of the convention of the 8th Vindemiaire of the year 9, is to be the condition for the plain and simple suppression of this article; or if the private opinion and personal sentiments of the Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States relative to the circumstances that this suppression may produce, are to imply a responsibility on the part of the American Government, the French minister may be led to believe that the interest of each party demands it, and they may perhaps look upon it as a means of strengthening the good understanding happily re-established between the two nations. But they do not believe it to be compatible with the interests and rights of France to consent freely and positively to the suppression of the article now under discussion.

They pray the Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States to accept the assurance of their distinguished consideration.

The undersigned, Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States of America, has the honor to inform the Ministers Plenipotentiary of the French Republic, in answer to their note of to-day, (8th Messidor,) that, while he deeply regrets that they will not agree to the pure and simple suppression of the second article of the convention, so sincere are the desires of his Government to cultivate a good intelligence with the French Republic, he is authorized by the President, and is ready to accept a ratification on their part, by which the second article shall be re-established, reserving to the Senate of the United States their constitutional right to advise or refuse a ratification in that form, and the new additional article be adopted after this official declaration, he hopes that the way will have been cleared for the indulgence of that more magnanimous policy which, he still thinks, ought to lead to the pure and simple suppression of the second article.

There are great moments between nations in which mutual interests, if freely permitted to work, will better accomplish the ends of wisdom than could be effected by the systematic skill of the ablest politicians.

He begs leave to assure the Ministers Plenipotentiary of the French Republic of the sentiments of his high consideration

No. 6.—Mr. Murray, commissioned to exchange the ratifications of the Convention of 1800 with France, to Mr. Madison, Secretary of State of the United States, dated Paris, July 1, 1801.

SIR: By the NOS. 14 and 15, which I have the honor to enclose, you will see that the French ministers have refused to agree to the unconditional suppression of the second article.

To you, sir, I can say that I wish I had been authorized to subscribe to a joint abandonment of treaties and indemnities. As claims, they will always be set off against each other by them; and I consider the cessation of their claim to treaties as valuable.

I believe that they will offer a conditional ratification, similar to ours, with the suppression of the second article and the admission of the new one, provided the two Governments exchange declarations, by which all claims to treaties and indemnities be mutually abandoned.

I write in haste, by post, to reach the frigate, which, I hear this moment, has not sailed.

No. 7.—Mr. Murray, commissioned to exchange the ratifications of the Convention of 1800 with France, to Mr. Madison, Secretary of State, dated Paris, July 2, 1801.

Mr. Roederer called to see me yesterday, p. m. They wish, as I had expected, to pass by the offer to re-establish the second article, and to do one of two things:

1st. That there be an article in the proces verbal of the exchange of the following import: That, in a year, shall be exchanged an article, declaring that the respective pretensions, which were the object of the second article, shall never be reproduced—(I here follow a close translation of what Mr. R. said.) Or,

2d. A ratification, on their part, on the same condition.

In the first alternative, the ratification, on their part, would be a pure and simple accession to our terms, and the reserve would be in the paper, which, it is usual, on exchanges, to interchange among the ministers employed, in the nature of a certificate of exchange, which is more for their own security than to add validity to anything done.

As, in either branch of the alternative, no time would be gained, because the Senate would have to act on either, I shall, if the choice be placed officially, prefer the latter. The first would be the most agreeable, as it avoids the public appearance of a retort, on their part, by giving, in turn, a conditional ratification. But having no power to dispose of what may be considered as a valuable claim for the future, though I do not consider it as worth a quarter per centum, and not accelerating the final arrangement by taking on me this responsibility, I shall decline the first proposition. Indeed, I have already informed them that I could not sign an article to that effect; but it was never before so formally brought forward.

As to the additional article, the French minister reported in favor of its adoption, and stated the arguments, which I made use of at the first conference on the 8th ultimo, in their report; these were drawn from my instructions.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, sir, your most obedient servant,

Messrs. Fleurieu and Roederer, Ministers Plenipotentiary of the French Republic, to Mr. Murray, commissioned to exchange the ratifications with France, dated Paris, 14th Messidor, an 9, (July 3, 1801.)

[Translation.]

The Ministers Plenipotentiary of the French Republic have attentively examined the note which Mr. Murray, Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States, did them the honor to address to them le — Messidor, (27th of June.)

It appears to them that the convention to re-establish the second article as the condition of the exchange of ratifications cannot be the course best adapted to the views which animate both Governments, and to the opinion that the French Government entertained such motives as gave cause to the suppression passed by the Senate.

The French Government is glad to believe that these motives were adopted to strengthen the friendship re-established between the two nations, by keeping at a distance, as much as possible, such discussions as could, by any means, impair it anew.

The French ministers are of the opinion that the only means to perpetuate the intentions of the two Governments, and to derive from them a happy result, would be that the respective ministers agree upon the exchange of ratifications, that the reciprocal pretensions, which were the object of the second article, should not be brought forward at any future period. This convention will be signed by both parties.

The French ministers pray the Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States to accept the assurance of their high consideration.

The undersigned, Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States of America, has weighed with the greatest attention the proposition for a joint signature of an article in the act of exchange of ratifications made by the Ministers Plenipotentiary of the French Republic, in their note of the 3d of July, (14th Messidor,) which he had the honor to receive from them.

Any remarks which he could make for or against the proposition, considered in its merits, would be deemed superfluous, when he assures the ministers that, after mature reflection, he finds that he is not authorized to enter into such an engagement for his Government; and he believes he can in no manner better reciprocate their own candor than by so frank an assurance.

He still flatters himself that, with the amicable views mutually entertained, this last proposition, to which he is unable to subscribe, will not be considered as the sole means of giving effect to the happy dispositions which are certainly felt by both Governments; for he yet trusts that the obstacles, which he conceives to be more derived from form than from motives, will be overcome by these dispositions, and the great policy that rest on substantial and plain interest.

He has the honor to offer the Ministers Plenipotentiary of the French Republic the assurance of his high consideration.

No. 8.—Mr. Murray, commissioned to exchange the ratifications of the Convention of 1800 with France, to Mr. Madison, Secretary of State of the United States, dated Paris, July 9, 1801.

Numbers 16 and 17, which I have the honor to enclose, will show you the present state of the negotiation since my last.

The sole difficulty is the abandonment on each side of pretensions arising from indemnities and treaties. It is extremely difficult for me officially to say anything on these points. We consider treaties as not existing; they consider them (at least for purposes of negotiation) as not surrendered on their part. They wish to get rid of both the claim to treaties and indemnities. Unless I were authorized, I cannot speak upon the claim to indemnities, nor admit the claim to treaties as forming an object of discussion. All then, sir, that I can attempt is to obtain the general object which you have prescribed, without venturing upon discussions of a ticklish nature, but the discussion of which is intimately entangled with this general object. The reserve apparent in my notes will be thus explained. My object is yet to obtain a simple exchange on our terms, and even yet I do not despair of obtaining it, or something very near it.

The frigate will now depart for the United States, but I shall search for opportunities every week to keep Government exactly informed.

The ill health of Mr. Talleyrand has obliged him to go to the baths, an hundred and eighty miles from Paris. He will be absent a month. The foreign relations are deposited with Mr. Caillard, late minister at the Hague and at Berlin. Bonaparte has been indisposed, but I am happy to inform you that he is better. These things, united with the difficulties of the case, tend to delay.

I have the honor to be, with high respect, sir, your most obedient servant,

SIR: From a conversation which I had two days since with one of the French ministers, I understand that they are deliberating upon the choice of one of the two following modes of ratification:

To ratify on condition of reciprocal abandonment of pretensions under the 2d article, or to ratify on our terms, but with a declaration incorporated in the language that they consider the suppression of that article as an abandonment of all claims and pretensions under it. I can answer for the substance only, as it is from conversation that I learn it.

I believe, sir, and wish that they will pursue the last mode; nothing will be done on my part to affirm their construction of the motives which led the United States to the suppression.

Next to a pure and simple adoption of our act, the last appears to me to be the best for the United States, and if nothing better can be done I shall exchange on their offering me such a ratification.

The frigate will have sailed about this time, I presume.

SIR: At length they will ratify, but with a declaration in the body of their act that the omission of the second article, and the addition of the new one of limitation, to both of which they will formally assent, are to be considered as an abandonment respectively of the pretensions under that 2d article.

Convinced, sir, as I am, that nothing better can be gained, and confiding in a liberal judgment in Government upon the situation in which I am placed, I shall exchange upon these terms.

In a very few days I trust that I shall be able to enclose to you the instrument exchanged.

I have but a moment to send this by a traveller to Bordeaux, and it is late at night.

SIR: Though uninstructed to say anything upon the 4th article, yet, as I had officially informed the French ministers, in my note of the 15th of June, of the execution of the convention on the part of the United States, I thought myself bound to obtain some explanation of their instructions on that article. Its objects are of a perishable nature, and the inquietudes of the parties concerned, and intrigues of the privateersmen to buy out the claims, and of others to cajole or alarm the captains—and intrigues without number respecting it.

On conversing with Mr. Roederer some days since—the others I was not fortunate enough to find at home, after several calls—he referred me to Mr. Talleyrand, considering the matter as out of his competence. He promised to speak to him, and to urge the execution of the 4th article immediately. I had twice before called on Mr. Talleyrand, but he was as [at] Malmasion. On the 9th I wrote to him a billet, telling him that I would call on him at two yesterday. He received me.

I informed him that I came to talk with him on the execution of the 4th article of the convention; that, in my note of the 15th June, I had officially assured them that my Government was executing that act "independently of events." That I had not demanded that such a declaration should be reciprocated; but that I certainly had expected it of them. That the 4th article was of a nature to be in a great measure defeated by delay; and that now the exchange was made, and after my official declaration, good faith required that they should give a prompt execution especially to that article. He assured me, with great cordiality, that it should be done; and that he would immediately write to the Commissary of the Government, near the Council of Prizes, to recommend the trials of American cases. On my informing him that I should now immediately leave Paris, he promised to send to me at the Hague a copy of his letter, of which I could make official use.

To-morrow I shall set off for the Hague; and it gives me pleasure to give you the above intelligence.

I am, with great respect, sir, your most obedient servant,

W. V. MURRAY.

P. S. The ratifications were exchanged the 31st July, at night; and on the 3d instant I delivered the French ratification to Mr. Dawson, sealed up. I have sent information of this to you, sir, by different routes.

Mr. Murray, commissioned to exchange the ratifications of the Convention of 1800 with France, to Mr. Madison, Secretary of State of the United States.

No. 13.] PARIS, August 3, 1801.

SIR: The ratifications of the convention between the United States and the French Republic, of 30th September last, having been exchanged on the night of the 31st ultimo, between the French ministers, Messrs. Joseph Bonaparte, Fleurieu, and Roederer, and myself, I herewith have the honor to enclose, under my seal and in a paste-board box, the copy ratified on the part of the French Government. This I delivered, agreeably to instructions, to the honorable Mr. John Dawson; Mr. Appleton, of Boston, is to carry it to you.

Perfectly in the dark, as I am, on the views of the Senate in suppressing the second article, I cannot know the extent of the responsibility which I have assumed in accepting the French ratification.

Had we re-established the 2d article, or had their ratification been expressly conditional, or had mutual releases of claims been passed in the proces verbal, the exchange could not have closed the business, as the Senate must still have acted. The acceptance, on my part, of their declaratory ratification leaves the business to be acted on or not. If it be necessary to act on it, it must be because the Senate intended to reserve rights and let France reserve claims. If the Senate meant, as I hope, to consider indemnities as worth nothing, then the business, I presume, is closed.

At first, sir, they certainly did feel an objection, which they thought very important to the suppression of the 2d article, that, if admitted, it destroys their claims but not ours. Their pride was also some obstacle, and this gave new difficulties to any form of proceeding to obtain what they afterwards wished to accomplish, for they became convinced of the propriety of having the 2d article out of the act. They then naturally endeavored to make the most of the suppression, and remained firm in the intention of not ratifying but in some form that should save their pride, and declare their intentions and meaning as you find them expressed.

In accepting their ratification, I have pursued what I believed would have been your instructions had the question been foreseen. I have searched for the ground of such a supposed will of the Government by the only clue in my power; the interest of the United States in relation to France at present; their present relations with her by the full execution of the convention on our part "independently of events;" the motives here for the execution, on the part of France, under the 4th and 5th articles; the difficulties of the late negotiation last year on the point of claims; the value of a formal renunciation of the old treaties; and in the absolute want of value in the prospect of indemnities; and I concluded it for the best to exchange rather than to break off.

The limitation is sufficiently adopted by them though they would not make a new article of it.

Their act is in French only. I objected; but, sir, the object was not worth a delay of 20 days, which the re-copying would have taken; and it is a ratification of the convention which is in both languages.

As soon as I take leave and get ready for my journey I shall set off for the Hague; and, agreeably to my letter of recall, which I received the 27th ultimo, shall embark for America.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, sir, your most obedient servant,

W. V. MURRAY.

No. 430.

The Convention between the French Republic and the United States, dated September 30, 1800.

[Extract.]

ARTICLE 2. The Ministers Plenipotentiary of the two parties not being able to agree, at present, respecting the treaty of alliance of 6th February, 1778, the treaty of amity and commerce of the same date, and the convention of 14th November, 1788, nor upon the indemnities mutually due or claimed, the parties will negotiate further on these subjects at a convenient time; and until they may have agreed upon these points the said treaties and convention shall have no operation, and the relations of the two countries shall be regulated as follows:

ARTICLE 3. The public ships which have been taken on one part and the other, or which may be taken before the exchange of ratifications, shall be restored.

ARTICLE 4. Property captured, and not yet definitely condemned, or which may be captured before the exchange of ratifications, (contraband goods destined to an enemy's port excepted,) shall be mutually restored on the following proofs of ownership, viz. The proof on both sides with respect to merchant ships, whether armed or unarmed, shall be a passport in the form following:

"To all who shall see these presents, greeting:

"It is hereby made known that leave and permission has been given to ——, master and commander of the ship called ———, of the town of ———, burden ——— tons, or thereabouts, now lying in the port and haven of ———, and bound for ———, and laden with ———, after that his ship has been visited, and before sailing he shall make oath, before the officers who have the jurisdiction of maritime affairs, that the said ship belongs to one or more of the subjects of ———. The act whereof shall be put at the end of these presents, as likewise that he will keep, and cause to be kept by his crew on board, the marine ordinance and regulations and enter in the proper office a list, signed and witnessed, containing the names and surnames, the places of birth and abode of the crew of his ship, and of all who shall embark on board her, whom he shall not take on board without the knowledge and permission of the officers of the marine, and in every port or haven where he shall enter with his ship he shall show this present leave to the officers and judges of the marine, and shall give a faithful account to them of what passed and was done during his voyage; and he shall carry the colors, arms, and ensigns of the [French Republic or the United States] during his voyage. In witness whereof we have signed these presents, and put the seal of our arms thereunto, and caused the same to be countersigned by ———, at ———, the ——— day of ———, anno Domini ———." And this passport will be sufficient without any other paper, any ordinance to the contrary notwithstanding; which passport shall not be deemed requisite to have been renewed or recalled whatever number of voyages the said ship may have made, unless she shall have returned home within the space of a year. Proof with respect to the cargo shall be certificates containing the several particulars of the cargo, the place whence the ship sailed and whither she is bound, so that the forbidden and contraband goods may be distinguished by the certificates; which certificates shall have been made out by the officers of the place whence the ship set sail, in the accustomed form of the country. And if such passport or certificates, or both, shall have been destroyed by accident, or taken away by force, their deficiency may be supplied by such other proofs of ownership as are admissible by the general usage of nations. Proof with respect to other than merchant ships shall be the commission they bear.

This article shall take effect from the date of the signature of the present convention. And if, from the date of the said signature, any property shall be condemned contrary to the intent of the said convention, before the knowledge of this stipulation shall be obtained, the property so condemned shall, without delay, be restored or paid for.

ARTICLE 5. The debts contracted by one of the two nations with individuals of the other, or by the individuals of one with the individuals of the other, shall be paid, or the payment may be prosecuted in the same manner as if there had been no misunderstanding between the two States. But this clause shall not extend to indemnities claimed on account of captures or confiscations.

In faith whereof, the respective plenipotentiaries have signed the above articles both in the French and English languages, and they have thereto affixed their seals, declaring, nevertheless, that the signing in the two languages shall not be brought into precedent, nor in any way operate to the prejudice of either party. Done at Paris, the eighth of Vindemiaire, of the ninth year of the French Republic, the thirtieth day of September, anno Domini eighteeen hundred.

And whereas the Senate of the United States did, by their resolution on the third day of this present month of February, two-thirds of the senators then present concurring, consent to and advise the ratification of the said convention, provided the second article be expunged, and that the following article be added or inserted: "It is agreed that the present convention shall be in force for the term of eight years from the time of the exchange of the ratifications."

Now, therefore, I, John Adams, President of the United States of America, having seen and considered the convention and additional article above recited, do, in pursuance of the aforesaid advice and consent of the Senate of the said United States, by these presents accept, ratify, and confirm the said convention and additional article, and every clause and article thereof, as the same are herein before set forth, saving and excepting the second article of the said convention, which I hereby declare to be expunged and of no force or validity; and I do moreover hereby declare that the said convention, saving the second article as aforesaid, and the said additional article, form together one instrument, and are a convention between the United States of America and the French Republic, made by the President of the United States by and with the advice and consent of the Senate thereof.

In testimony whereof, I have caused the seal of the United States of America to be hereto affixed. Given under my hand at the city of Washington, this eighteeenth day of February, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and one, and of the independence of the said States the twenty-fifth.

JOHN ADAMS.

By the President:
JOHN MARSHALL, Acting as Secretary of State.

And whereas the said convention was, on the other part, ratified and confirmed by the First Consul of France, in the form of which the following is a translation from the French language, to wit:

Bonaparte, First Consul, in the name of the French people: The Consuls of the Republic having seen and examined the convention concluded, agreed to, and signed at Paris, the eighth Vindemiaire, 9th year of the French Republic, (September 30, 1800,) by the citizens Joseph Bonaparte, Fleurieu, and Roederer, Counsellors of State, in virtue of the full powers which have been given to them to this effect, with

Messieurs Ellsworth, Davie, and Murray, Ministers Plenipotentiary of the United States, equally furnished with full powers; the tenor of which convention follows:

Approves the above convention in all and each of the articles which are therein contained; declares that it is accepted, ratified, and confirmed, and promises that it shall be inviolably observed.

The Government of the United States having added to its ratification that the convention should be in force for the space of eight years, and having omitted the second article, the Government of the French Republic consents to accept, ratify, and confirm the above convention, with the addition importing that the convention shall be in force for the space of eight years, and with the retrenchment of the second article, provided that by this retrenchment the two States renounce the respective pretensions which are the object of the said article.

In faith whereof these presents are given. Signed, countersigned, and sealed with the great seal of the Republic, at Paris, the twelfth Thermidor, ninth year of the Republic, (July 31, 1801.)

HUGHES B. MARET, Secretary of State.

Which ratifications were duly exchanged at Paris on the 31st day of July, in the present year; and having been so exchanged were again submitted to the Senate of the United States, who, on the 19th day of the present month, resolved that they consider the said convention as fully ratified, and returned the same to the President for the usual promulgation. Now, therefore, to the end that the said convention may be observed and performed with good faith on the part of the United States, I have caused the premises to be made public, and I do hereby enjoin and require all persons bearing office, civil or military, within the United States, and all others, citizens or inhabitants thereof, or being within the same, faithfully to observe and fulfill the said convention and every clause and article thereof.

In testimony whereof, I have caused the seal of the United States to be affixed to these presents, and signed the same with my hand. [Extract.]

The Minister of Foreign Relations to Citizen Pichon, dated Paris, January 3, 1801.

I have this very day written to the Council of Prizes, requesting them to adjourn to an indefinite period all decisions upon every kind of property seized under the flag of the United States.

If this adjournment excites any inquietude in the United States, you will say that far from being intended to defer restitutions, it is, on the contrary, calculated to render them both more prompt and more certain.

As soon as the convention shall be ratified upon both sides, I will urge forward a decree of the Consuls, which shall replevy, for the Americans, all the prizes, the restitution of which has been engaged for. This step, in the first place, is the only one consistent with principle. It is, moreover, the most advantageous for the Americans, since it does away the intervention of the Council of Prizes, which could proceed only partially in the restitutions, and will save them from the unavoidable delays in its proceedings.

"To return, sir, in effect to the objects which are the subject of your reply, it only remains for me to pray you to offer to the President of the United States my thanks for the decisions which you have communicated to me from him.

"As to the sum of $15,000 advanced by the United States to succor the colonists who had fled from St. Domingo, I hesitate so little to acknowledge that the French Republic is accountable for it to these States, and am so sure that the principles which govern the First Consul of the Republic will lead him to admit this obligation, that I offer, sir, to include it in the liquidation, which I am desirous of making as soon as possible, of the claims which the Federal Government has upon that of the Republic, for the different advances which it has made for our prisoners, since the misunderstanding, and for every other purpose. I have had the honor, sir of praying you to be pleased to invite the respective departments who have made these advances to prepare their accounts.

"As soon as all expenses of this kind shall be closed, I shall think myself sufficiently authorized to settle and adjust them."

3d. "Citizen Pichon, as he intimated it, is authorized to take possession of all the property which is to be restored to individuals who are not present, or have no attorneys. The present state of war, and the constant habit of the consular administration of France, which has made Consuls guardians of property belonging to absentees, has suggested the measure; and other obvious reasons make it expedient for the administration and individuals both.

4th. "In all prizes made by American public vessels, one-half of the capture accruing to the United States, Citizen Pichon wishes to know whether even that half of the property is only to be restored by legislative concurrence or whether the Executive can give it up. It would be peculiarly gratifying in the case of the Vengeance, where individuals are yet present, and are soon embarking for France, at which place, from their military situation, it will prove extremely difficult for them to obtain their quota of the restored property."

No. 437.

Mr. Lincoln, Acting Secretary of State, to Messrs. Ellsworth and Murray, Envoys Extraordinary of the United States to France, dated Department of State, Washington, March, 1801.

Mr. Madison, the Secretary of State, benig not yet arrived at the seat of Government, I have been authorized by the President to discharge the duties of that office per interim; and among the objects which have claimed the earliest attention is the convention signed by yourselves and General Davie with the Government of France. This instrument was laid before the Senate on the 16th of December, and having met with considerable difficulties there, was under discussion till their final vote on the 3d of February, by which they advised and consented to the ratification of it with the suppression of the 2d article and the addition of an article limiting its duration. The term of change in the administration being then approaching, this matter has rested to the present moment. Though the day agreed on for exchange of ratifications will, from these unavoidable causes, have passed over, yet we apprehend that that exchange, being only a matter of form, will suffer no difficulty, and then it will take place on your receipt of this, as a matter of course, if the modifications of the Senate meet with no objection, as we hope they will not. It appeared from the documents you transmitted that the 2d article was chiefly of your own soliciting, and that its omission is not likely to be disagreeable to France. There was in the Senate a considerable diversity of sentiment on it, and as, by our Constitution, one-third of that body can negative a treaty, or any particular article of it, there was found to be a sufficient number against this article to effect its negative. With respect to the additional article, limiting the duration, you will recollect there was an express instruction to that effect among those given to you. It is perhaps unwise policy in any nation to bind itself perpetually by an act which requires the consent of another nation to annul. It is most unwise in us of all nations, because the circumstances of our existence, and of our relations with others, change so rapidly. What is now advantageous may soon become otherwise, and our increasing strength is daily facilitating the command of just dispositions on the part of others. It has, therefore, been the invariable policy of this country, since the date of its earliest treaties, to enter into none which shall not be limited to short terms, and now look forward with desire to the moment when we shall be free from compact with every nation, and have a right to govern ourselves with every one according to the principles of justice, and of friendship proportioned to what we experience from them. We hope and trust these modifications by the Senate will meet with no difficulty, and you are accordingly desired to use your best endeavors to obtain an acquiescence in them, and a final ratification in that form; nevertheless, should the suppression of the 2d article meet with obstacles on their part, which we do not expect, rather than keep things between the two countries in their present unsettled state, you might accept a ratification re-establishing the 2d article, only reserving to the Senate their constitutional right to advise or refuse a ratification in that form. But as to the additional article, limiting the duration, it is a sine qua non from which we cannot depart. In every event we are carrying the convention into execution in all its parts. All hostilities on the sea have been forbidden, our vessels are returning into port, the prisoners in our possession are in a course of delivery to M. Letombe, former Consul of France, he is notified that all those officers may resume their functions, commercial intercourse is restored, a number of our vessels actually cleared out and departed for France, and orders given for the restitution of vessels under the 3d article of the convention; but I am sorry to say there is great reason to apprehend the Insurgente is lost, together with a vessel of ours called the Pickering, and all their crews. They were on a cruise together in the West Indies, in the month of August last, since which neither have ever been heard of. Should they return, (which, however, we do not expect,) the Insurgente shall be immediately restored according to the convention.

It is possible that these modifications of the convention may give rise to new discussions between yourselves and those whom the Government of France may authorize on their part, and as we observe that an armed coalition in vindication of neutral rights is formed or forming in Europe, it is also possible that Government may indulge a wish that we should take a part in it, and may make it an ingredient in the new discussions. In that case, you are to set your faces against it at once, and to declare it a subject on which you have not a word to say, nor will say a word. In truth, we are determined to take no part in European quarrels; we will endeavor, by a rigorous observance of justice toward all nations, to preserve peace and commerce with all; and we will not suffer our peace to be committed, but by our own actions, or those of others immediately respecting ourselves. We shall endeavor to lead nations to their interest, to observe all the terms of good correspondence and neighborhood with us, and if they fail in these to make it still their interest to return to them. To connect ourselves with the complicated combinations of the interests of Europe would be to relinquish the most precious gift of nature, insulation from the power and politics of that continent.

As this matter will of course bring you into conference with the Minister of Foreign Affairs for that Government, you are desired to avail yourself of that opportunity of conveying to the Government assurances of the friendship of this country to that, that the President will omit no occasion of proving to them his dispositions and wishes to cultivate harmony and good correspondence, by an observance of all those attentions and procedures which are found in respect, in justice, and in usage, between nation and nation, by a rigorous regard to justice in whatsoever may arise between us, and by every proof of friendship and favor which may be consistent with the justice due to others. He sincerely prays and hopes that the war in which that country is now engaged may be speedily terminated, and pledges himself, during its continuance, to observe a faithful and conscientious neutrality towards all the belligerent powers.

The honorable Mr. Dawson, member of the late Congress from the State of Virginia, will deliver you this, with the treaty which is committed to his care. He will direct the vessel which carries him to return without delay, and awaiting the ratification on the part of France, he will receive it from you, and take his passage back in some other vessel. You are desired to press for this ratification with as little delay as possible, and being obtained and delivered to Mr. Dawson, you will consider it as closing your proceedings and powers; so soon as it is received here a Minister Plenipotentiary will be sent on our part to reside with that nation.

I am, gentlemen, &c., &c.,

Mr. Pichon to Mr. Madison, Secretary of State of the United States, dated Georgetown, 21st Messidor, 9th year, (July 10, 1801.)

Citizen Pichon returns the Secretary of State, with his best compliments, the enclosed papers, which were communicated for Citizen Pichon's examination.

It is Citizen Pichon's opinion that the cases of American captures by French West India cruisers, described in those papers, all except the case No. 1, of the brig Betsey, of Norwich, captured January 1797, and adjudged on the 14th, come within the provisions of the 4th article of the treaty, and will accordingly, upon application made by the claimants, be duly compensated. Citizen Pichon is sorry to find that in the case last transmitted of the brig Polly, condemned at Guadaloupe in October last, the present Governor, La Crosse, on application, has given it out as his opinion, which is, probably, to extend to similar cases, that the settlement of those claims is to take place at Paris, and to be referred to the Council of Prizes. Upon the first notice of the decision, Citizen Pichon wrote to General La Crosse in the terms of the enclosed extract. However, he thinks it advisable that all claimants under the late treaty for captures carried in the West Indies do apply to the administration of those places, and there procure with the decrees of adjudication a written answer on their claim, in order that, in France, no argument may be objected to them from the possibility of their having successfully applied to the Colonial Administrations, who, unless Citizen Pichon is very much mistaken, are fully authorized to execute their part of that stipulation of the treaty; but who, also, from their embarrassed circumstances, may not have competent means to do it immediately.

No. 440.

[Translation.]

The Minister of Exterior Relations to Mr. Pichon, dated 16th Thermidor, year 9 of the Republic, August 4, 1801.

[Extract.]

I have received, citizen, your despatch of the 14th Prairial, (4th June,) and the papers you have enclosed with it.

I have the pleasure to inform you that the Government of the Republic has ratified the convention of the 9th Vindemiaire, (30th of September.) It has not escaped you that the ratification of the Senate and of the American Government, in truth, unusual, irregular, and incomplete, has placed us in a position which was not in reality embarrassing, but because we were sincerely disposed to enter into, with the United States, our ancient relations of good understanding and amity. It would have been extremely easy and plausible to terminate this discussion by a refusal to ratify, in citing the radical defect of the American ratification; but then the reconciliation of both nations would have remained uncertain, and would have been left to the chances of an unknown futurity. The Government has preferred to terminate this debate in the manner the most conformable to the interests and to the sentiments of the two nations. However, as in ratifying without explanation, the two Governments would have found themselves in an unequal position relative to the pretensions expressed in the suppressed article; the suppression of this article releasing the Americans from all pretensions, on our part, relative to ancient treaties, and our silence, respecting the same article, leaving us exposed to the whole weight of the eventual demands of this Government relative to indemnities; it has become necessary that a form be introduced into the act of ratification, in order to express the sense in which the Government of the Republic understood and accepted the abolition of the suppressed article.

I transmit to you, herein enclosed, the form of ratification and the verbal process of exchange. I ought not to suppose that this act could be the object of any explanation between you and the Federal Government; in every case the particulars of the negotiation are perfectly known to you.

You know that the second article had not been introduced into the convention without repugnance on the part of the American minister. Mr. Murray, urged by our ministers to explain the motive for the suppression of this article, declared that the question was too interesting not to have already captivated his attention; and that, taking for the basis of the views of his Government the desire to establish harmony between the two nations, he was of opinion that the motive for the rejection of the second article could be found in the article itself, looking upon it as susceptible of producing disquiets in future, by promising nothing but an ulterior and discordant negotiation; and in the desire of placing reciprocal friendship rather in the natural course of things, than hazard it in an article which, if it had ever been executed, would have a palpable tendency to disturb it.

This is a full and wise explanation. It is, moreover, too conformable to the dispositions of harmony which exists between the two Governments, and of regard which united both nations, that the Government of the Republic should not have heard, with certainty, that the abolition of the second article was equivalent to the abolition of all the pretensions that have so long established discord in the relations of the two countries and in the discussions of their legislatures.

I have room to believe that, in your immediate answer to my despatch of this day, you will inform me of the approaching departure of Mr. Livingston. In awaiting the arrival of the Republican minister, and the definitive nomination of the Commissioners of Commercial Relations, I confide in the zeal of the agents whom you have provisionally appointed, and in the wisdom of the directions which they receive of you.

I salute you.

The Particular Director of the General Liquidation of the Public Debt to Mr. Skipwith, Commercial Agent of the United States, and Commissioner appointed for the examination of American Claims, dated Paris, the 21st Ventose, year 12 of the Republic, (March 12, 1801.)

[Translation.]

The Counsellor of State, Director General of the Liquidation, sir, has sent back to me the two letters which you wrote to him on the 24th of February, 1st of March, (4th and 10th of this month,) to which are added fifteen certificates of the American commission, relative to as many credits as were by it deemed inadmissible, and to which it appears that this commission did not consider itself possessed of the power to apply the disposition of the convention of the 30th of April, (10th Floreal ultimo.) I know not, sir, if at the time of the examination which you made in my bureau of papers relative to these fifteen claims, whether you were of opinion that they did or did not form a part of the exceptions taken into the convention, at least have not given me information on the subject; but, as you would probably have made, in conformity to the 10th article of the convention of the 10th Floreal, a report to the American commission upon each of the claims of which it treats, and that the Director General desires the General Council of Liquidation to inform itself of the motives of the rejection which has been made of these claims, I pray you, sir, to transmit them to him, or direct them to me directly.

I have the honor to salute you.

The Minister of Exterior Relations of the French Republic to Mr. Pichon, Chargé d'Affaires and Commissary General of the Republic near the United States, dated Paris, 23d Prairial, year 9, (June 12, 1801.)

[Extract.]

"As to the difficulties which the form of ratification sent by the Federal Government may give rise to, Mr. Murray has just arrived at Paris to treat of them with the French ministers who had signed the convention, and these conferences are to be continually kept open. I shall lose no time in communicating to you their result, in order to put a stop, as soon as possible, to whatsoever your political position may still have of an embarrassing and unsettled nature.

"The French Government, after having given proofs of their desire of reconciliation, with so much candor, and even without reserve, have necessarily observed with reluctance that there were yet some discussions to enter into respecting an act which ought to have terminated them all. I cannot represent to you after what manner the points in dispute will be regulated; I will only state to you that the liberal dispositions of the French Government towards the United States are not changed, and that they are always disposed to terminate, by a course the most honorable to both powers, the differences which have for some time kept them apart."

Mr. R. R. Livingston, Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States to France, to Mr. Madison, Secretary of State of the United States, dated Clermont, September 16, 1801.

"France is greatly interested in our guarantee of their islands, particularly since the changes that have taken place in the West Indies, and those which they may have still reason to apprehend there. I do not, therefore, wonder at the delay of the ratification, nor shall I be surprised if she consents to purchase it by the restoration of our captured vessels. This ground is very delicate, and I hope to be favored with your sentiments very much at large upon it, and the most explicit instructions, in case the negotiation should not be finished by Mr. Murray."

No. 444.

Mr. Madison, Secretary of State of the United States, to Mr. Livingston, Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States to France, dated Department of State, September 28, 1801.

[Extract.]

"You have been already informed of the intention of the President that your departure for France should be hastened, and that you would be furnished with a passage in the Boston frigate, which, after landing you at Bordeaux, is to proceed to the Mediterranean. When this intention was communicated, it was understood that some difficulty had arisen in obtaining from the French Government a ratification of the convention as altered by the Senate. We now learn, by letters from Mr. Mountflorence, that the ratification took place on the 31st of July, and that Mr. Appleton is on his way with it to the United States. This change in the state of things coincides with the other reasons for your speedy departure, and the President wishes it to take place as soon as your preparations and those of the frigate will admit.

"You will herewith receive your commission as Minister Plenipotentiary from the United States to the French Republic, and your letter of credence.

"In presenting the latter, the President authorizes and charges you to give the fullest assurances of the friendship of the United States towards the French Republic—of their disposition, as well as his own, to cultivate a perfect harmony and good correspondence between the two nations, and of the sincere pleasure resulting from the termination of the late painful differences, in a manner that promises a return of mutual confidence and beneficial intercourse. These sentiments you will convey in the terms best calculated to give cordiality to the reconciliation which has taken place, and to prepare a favorable way for such further discussions and arrangements as the interest of the United States may require.

"As you will be able to assure the French Government of the good faith with which the convention will be executed on the part of the United States, an execution of it with equal punctuality on theirs may, with the greater propriety and effect, be insisted on. The restitutions in behalf of the United States, stipulated by the fourth article of the convention, will claim your particular attention. They embrace three descriptions of claims: 1st, cases of capture wherein no judicial proceedings have been had; 2d, cases carried before French tribunals, and not definitively decided on the 30th September, 1800; 3d, captures made subsequent to that date.

"Considering the very great irregularities practised by French cruisers, especially in the West Indies, it is probable that the first description comprehends a large amount of property. For disclosing and verifying captures of this description, the exertions of the claimants must be chiefly relied on. Some few cases of the last description are known to have arisen in the West Indies before the signature of the convention was known. In other quarters similar captures may have been made from the same causes. In these instances, also, the requisite information may be expected from the sufferers. Of the second description, a tolerably comprehensive detail can, no doubt, he obtained from the Council of Prizes and from Mr. Mountflorence, if remaining at Paris, who seems to have had the superintendence of most of them.

"It seems to admit of no question that all captured property, (except contraband, destined to the port of an enemy,) proved to be American, in the manner described in the 4th article of the convention, whether depending at the date thereof in the Council of Prizes, or removable thither according to the then laws of France, and consequently not definitively condemned, must be restored specifically, or paid for either by the captors or by the French Government.

"We cannot but consider as unfortunate, in relation to both parties, the order of the Minister of Exterior Relations to the Council of Prizes, in January last, for suspending indefinitely and indiscriminately decisions on every species of property captured under the flag of the United States, which suspension was continued at the date of our last advices from Paris. We are, indeed, informed by Mr. Pichon, on the authority of the minister, that, as soon as the convention should be ratified on both sides, he would move a decree of the Consuls, for surrendering this property without the intervention of the Council. But, in the meantime, captures which would have been restored, according to the laws applicable thereto, without the aid of the convention, being involved in the general suspension, we are justified in complaining that the funds of our merchants have been unnecessarily withheld from them. Nor is this all. The rest of the property, so far as it remained in kind, may have partially decayed, or, when reduced to money, may have been converted more or less to public or private use. Hence, when the restitutions are to be liquidated, less may be received than the value which would have been recovered if the Council had been permitted to take its course, or if the restitutions had been immediately made; whilst the French Government will be bound to pay out of the Treasury for other property which has melted in the hands of privateersmen. This subject will claim your attention, and justify the representations most likely to obtain equitable arrangements for carrying into effect this part of the convention."

No. 445.

Mr. Livingston to the Secretary of State, dated Paris, December 10, 1801.

[Extract.]

"I found that nothing had yet been done for the American debt, and that the Council of Prizes were still condemning in the very face of the treaty. I yesterday had a private audience of the minister; I stated to him, in strong terms, the conduct of the Council, and showed him that it was not only very injurious to the Americans, but must be ultimately so to France, since the Government would have to pay what was dissipated by the captors. He seemed perfectly to agree with me, and to wish that I would bring forward their enormities as soon as possible. The fact is, he has been overruled in the constitution of this body, and they have a strong support.

"I have directed Mr. Skipwith to give me short statements of the several cases to annex to a note I shall present as soon as possible. I entered upon the debt due to the American citizens, and endeavored to impress the minister not only with the injustice, but with the impolicy of the delay, as the want of credit might affect not only their manufactures, but their armament going to the West Indies, and concluded by desiring to know whether any or what arrangements had been made for the discharge of those demands that were actually liquidated. He told me that this not being within his department, he could not immediately satisfy my inquiries, but that he would do it as soon as possible, which was, in other words, to waive the business."

"SIR: The convention with the French Republic, as finally exchanged by Mr. Murray, arrived here on the 9th day of October last, in the hands of Mr. Appleton. As the form of ratification by the French Government contained a clause declaratory of the effect given to the meaning of the treaty by the suppression of the second article, it was thought by the President most safe, as a precedent, to ask anew the sanction of the Senate to the instrument with that ingredient. No decision has yet been taken by that body; and from the novelty of the case, the number of absent members, and the delays incident to questions of form, it is possible that it may be some little time yet before the subject is brought to a conclusion. It is not, however, to be presumed that any serious difficulty can ultimately clog it, and it is hoped that nothing in the present appearance will mislead the French Government into a suspension of proceedings for giving to the United States the benefits of the treaty. I am authorized to say that the President does not regard the declaratory clause as more than a legitimate inference from the rejection by the Senate of the second article, and that he is disposed to go on with the measures due under the compact to the French Republic."

"You will find by the proceedings of the House of Representatives, sketched in the newspapers herewith enclosed, that the injury threatened to our navigation by foreign regulations brought into activity by the peace, more particularly by the countervailing act of Great Britain, founded on her construction of the treaty of 1794, has engaged the attention of that Assembly. The resolution proposed by General Smith has been as yet very partially discussed, and it is uncertain what shape or turn may finally be given to it."

"The reluctance we have shown to a renewal of the treaty of 1778 has created many suspicions. Among other absurd ones, they believe seriously that we have an eye to the conquest of their islands. This business of Louisiana also originated in that; and they say expressly that they could have had no pretence, so far as related to the Floridas, to make this exchange, had the treaty been renewed, since, by the 6th article, they were expressly prohibited from touching the Floridas. I own I have always considered this article and the guarantee of our independence as more important to us than the guarantee of the islands was to France, and the sacrifices we have made of an immense claim to get rid of it as a dead loss."

No. 448.

Mr. Livingston to the Minister of Exterior Relations for the French Republic, dated 1st Pluviose, 1802, (20th of January.)

SIR: It is not without pain that I find myself compelled, so shortly after my arrival, to complain to the French Government of direct and manifest violations of that convention which was considered in the United States as the basis of peace and the sacred pledge of harmony and friendship between the two Republics.

Whatever sacrifices the United States may have made to obtain it, they made them with pleasure, because they felt with pain the state of alienation in which they had been placed with their earliest ally; and I was, accordingly, charged by the President to inform the First Consul of their strict adherence to every article it contained. And this assurance had, I flatter myself, been preceded, on the part of the Government of the United States, by every act of good faith and friendship that the convention enjoined. But, sir, I do sufficient justice to the integrity of the French Government to be persuaded that the infractions of the convention, which make the subject of this note, will not be seen by them with indifference; and that the misconstruction of it by the Council of Prizes, and the injuries their decisions have done, (under mistaken impressions,) will be speedily remedied by your friendly representation and the interposition of the Government. I believe, sir, it will not be disputed that it was the intention of the convention that, 1st, all vessels taken after its signature; 2d, all vessels previously taken, where no judicial proceedings had been had; 3d, all vessels on which no definite sentence had been given before that day, or which, by the laws of France, were removable from any other tribunal to the Council of Prizes, are to be determined by the 4th article, (contraband designed for an enemy excepted;) and that the only question relative to the cases of vessels or property under these circumstances is, had they the proofs and papers required by the 4th article of the convention?

With respect to property under these circumstances, the American Government had received authorized assurances from Mr. Pichon that its return would be immediately recommended on the ratification of the convention, by an arrêté of the Consuls, without the intervention of the Council of Prizes. How advantageous such an arrêt would be to both nations is obvious, since the delay occasioned by going through all the forms of a trial in the Council of Prizes, which sits but two days in a decade, is extremely injurious to the merchant, whose capital is so long diverted from its intended object, and who is at daily expense in the maintenance of his seamen. Nor, on the other hand, is it uninteresting to the French nation, since an immediate acquittal would generally enable the captured to obtain his damages from the captors. But when, by delay, the consequent ruin of the voyage, and the destruction or forced sale of perishable articles, the damages are greatly enhanced, they will frequently be unattainable from the captors; and, in that case, the French Government will become liable for them.

Under similar impressions the Government of the United States have acted, and immediately, without the intervention of courts or councils, discharged such ships as fell within the purview of the convention.

I cannot, then, but flatter myself, sir, that all vessels captured after 30th of September, 1800, will be discharged by an arrêt of the Consuls, without trial; and that the parties shall be left to pursue their remedy for damages occasioned by the capture and delay before the Council, without any detention of the ships; or, where the ship has been sold and the money deposited to await the event of a trial, that it be immediately restored, in like manner as the vessel would have been—the cause only being retained so far as may relate to additional damages; and that, for the furtherance of this latter business, the Council may be directed to devote a certain portion of every decade to this particular object. If the Government should not think proper to extend their decree to all the cases that may fall under the 4th article, but confine it merely to cases of captures subsequent to the 30th of September, 1800, I then presume to hope, sir, that the Council of Prizes will be directed to confine themselves simply to the inquiries pointed out by the convention, viz: had the ship the papers required by the 4th article?

It will appear, sir, by an investigation of the papers annexed, that they have allowed themselves a much greater latitude, and have even condemned, on pretences and proofs that would, I venture to say, have been insufficient in any maritime court, had no convention existed, (as for instance,) that a gun had been fired, though without the orders of the captain, after the vessel struck her colors. If, sir, the Council of Prizes are not confined, so far as their jurisdiction relates to the vessels of the United States, to the strict letter of convention, how is the situation of the captured bettered by it?

Viewing the Council of Prizes as a political board, and their proceedings divested of those solemnities which the French nation have deemed necessary, where a right to property depends upon a point of law, I venture to hope that, when the matter before them is a mere question of law—as, whether an appeal has been properly entered; whether the causes for not entering it in time are justified by the circumstances? and many others of a similar nature—it may be determined by the Tribunal of Cassation, on a reference to it, and a full hearing of the parties before that court. These questions being extremely interesting on account of the many irregularities in the French colonial courts, and the doubts that must in many cases arise on the question whether a case had, or had not, been definitively settled previous to the convention, in the meantime, sir, I request that the judgment and condemnation made by the Council of Prizes, 1st, where the capture was made after the 30th of September, 1800; 2d, where it was grounded upon any other circumstance than the want of the papers required by the 4th article of the convention, may be arrested and sent back to be determined agreeably to the stipulations of the convention, without regard to any other circumstance; and 3d, where the condemnations depended upon a mere question of law, that they may be suspended until they can be referred to and decided by the Tribunal of Cassation. I purposely forbear, sir, entering into the particular causes of complaint, since you will find them fully justified by the annexed cases, which will be verified by a reference to the records of the Council of Prizes, if any doubts should be entertained on the subject.

Confiding fully in the good faith of the Government, which has been proved not only by the facility with which the corps legislatif have given their sanction to the convention, by the liberal manner in which it was brought under their notice by the orators of Government, I forbear to press the various circumstances which at this interesting moment more particularly enforce the propriety of my demands.

I embrace this occasion, sir, to renew to you my sentiments of esteem, and the high consideration with which I have the honor to be, &c., &c.,

[Extract]

"I am almost hopeless as to our claims here. One expedient has struck me, which may possibly, but by no means certainly, succeed. It is, to propose that the United States open a loan here to a certain amount, say $6,000,000, which will about cover the liquidated debt; that, when a debt is liquidated, the creditor may subscribe to this loan, that shall open at 4½ per cent. At the same time, France shall open a loan at 5 per cent., to which the United States shall subscribe an amount equal to the debt she has assumed; covenanting, at the same time, that while the interest of this debt shall be punctually paid, she will not dispose of any part of it, except at certain long periods, and by instalments. The advantage that France will derive from this is, that her apprehensions about the fall of her present stock (by bringing more paper into the market) will be done away. The advantage to the United States will be, 1st, the saving from absolute ruin a number of their best disposed citizens; 2d, the putting an active capital into the hands of their merchants, which will be always more important than the interest they pay; 3d, the popularity it will give the Government; 4th, the advantage of paying at home, and drawing an interest from a foreign country, and the management of the exchange.

"Whether this can be effected I cannot say, but I wish to have the power to attempt it. Perhaps, by making it the interest of some, I may bring about what a sense of justice could never do. I must pray you, sir, to be particularly careful that this proposition be not mentioned; for, whether it succeeds or not, it will no sooner be known than it will become an object of private speculation."

No. 450.

Mr. Livingston to the Minister of Exterior Relations of the French Republic, dated Paris, 1st Ventose, an 10, (February 20, 1802.)

[Extract]

"The policy of the former Government of France led it to avoid all ground of controversy with the United States, not only by declining to possess any territory in their neighborhood, but by stipulating never to hold any. The undersigned does not, by this reference to the 6th article of the treaty of 1778, mean to reclaim any rights under it, since, by the convention of Paris, September 30, 1800, it is understood to be revoked; but merely to lead the French Government to reflect how far regard to the same policy might render it conducive to the mutual interest of both nations to cover, by a natural barrier, their possessions in America, as France has invariably sought to do in Europe."

No. 451.

Mr. Livingston to the Minister of Exterior Relations of the French Republic, dated [Paris,] February 24, 1802.

The undersigned Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States has the honor to remind the Minister of France for Exterior Relations that his several notes heretofore transmitted him remain unnoticed. Two of them are so important to the interest of the United States that he can no longer, in duty to them, forbear to request for them the attention of the Minister of Exterior Relations. The first, on the subject of the claims of American citizens, important in itself, is rendered more so by the actual position of the French colonies in America. The destruction and waste of property in the islands, the commencement of a new establishment in Louisiana, and the large fleets and armies at present in the West Indies, will probably require considerable supplies from the United States, while the return of peace has created a new confidence in France, strengthened, as the undersigned is informed, by reports now circulating there (probably by designing persons) of liberal measures that are said to be taken by the French Government for the faithful and immediate discharge of all their debts. It is the duty of the undersigned to transmit to his Government as early a statement of the measures about to be adopted on this subject as possible, with a view either to afford it the satisfaction that it will always feel in contributing to the interests of France, where it can be done without violating the duty it owes to itself, or of putting a stop to credits that must be ruinous to its citizens, already suffering under heavy losses sustained by the detention of a considerable capital in the hands of the French Government. As this subject will admit of no delay, the undersigned will think it his duty to state in his first despatches the measures he has taken to obtain payment, and the little ground that has been given him to hope for anything decisive on the part of the French Government, unless the Minister for Exterior Relations shall enable him to afford them information more conformable to their wishes and the expectations they have formed of the justice and resources of France. The second note alluded to is on the subject of the conduct of the Council of Prizes. On this, also, the Minister of Exterior Relations has omitted to afford him any decisive answer. In the meantime, the undersigned is receiving daily complaints of their entire disregard for the provisions of the treaty. When a vessel is even acquitted, it is done in such a manner as to amount to a total loss to the owner. Instead of awarding damages and costs, or even restoring the capture in the situation that it was when taken, they direct it to be restored in the state it now is, and charge the whole costs of detention, storage, &c., to the captured. The bills for these charges have alone amounted, on the cargo of a small brig, to 195,000 francs. And this, together with property plundered from the ship and stores, have, in general, exceeded the price at which the cargo would sell.

The undersigned prays the Minister of Exterior Relations to afford him some early information of the steps taken by the Government of France to prevent these abuses, and the violation of a treaty which it was earnestly hoped by the Government of the United States would serve as the basis of their future harmony.

No. 452.

Mr. Livingston to the Minister of Exterior Relations of the French Republic, dated Paris, 22d Ventose, an 10, [March 13.]

The undersigned Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States has the honor to transmit to the Minister of France for Exterior Relations a printed copy of a proclamation made by the President of the United States, promulgating the late convention between the French Republic and the United States, and strictly enjoining upon the officers, civil and military, and other citizens, the faithful observance of it.

By this it will appear that the Government of the United States did not consider the explanation, annexed by that of the French Republic, as occasioning any change in the treaty, or as requiring a new ratification. The undersigned has also the pleasure of informining the Minister of Exterior Relations that a law was before the Legislature of the United States, and has undoubtedly passed before this, for appropriating such sum of money as might be requisite for the perfect execution of the convention on their part. The undersigned ventures to hope that these evidences of the solicitude of his Government to fulfil, with the most scrupulous exactitude, the engagements they have entered into will be cordially met by the French Government and that complaints which have originated in the errors of inferior Departments will be speedily removed by the interposition of higher authorities.

No. 453.

Mr. Madison, Secretary of State of the United States, to Mr. Livingston, dated Department of State, March 16, 1802.

[Extract.]

"SIR: Your two favors of the 10th, continued on the 12th of December, and of the 31st of the same month, have been duly received, as were the two of preceding dates, written on your arrival at Nantz and L'Orient.

"We are anxious to know the result of your communications with the French Government on the subject of restitutions, both as to the rules by which they are to be settled and the prospect of their being satisfied. From the information of Mr. Pichon, it seems that the net proceeds only will be allowed where the property has been sold, which will operate against the United States in the proportion in which the claims of their citizens exceed those on the side of France. As the object of the stipulation is rather to restore what has been lost than what has been gained, there appears to be good ground for contending that the gross and not the net proceeds should be the measure of indemnification. Mr. Pichon gives us to understand, also, that the non-existence of the Insurgente at the date of the treaty will be no bar to the demand of her value. On a former occasion he had admitted the contrary, and his private opinion is no doubt still the same, but it is overruled by instructions from his Government. It is still hoped that the claim will not finally be pressed. A copy of my answer to a late note of Mr. Pichon, which I send you chiefly on account of the other subjects contained in it, will show you what has been added to the former reasoning addressed to him on the case of the Insurgente.

"The uncertainties supposed to attend a fulfilment of the convention by the French Government have excited a lively sensation in our citizens having claims under it, and have produced applications both to the Legislature and the Executive, urging a retention of the moneys due to French claimants as an eventual fund for the justice stipulated to themselves. A proceeding of this kind, however, is liable, under existing circumstances, at least, to the strongest objections. It would be grounding a breach of faith, on the presumption only of a breach of faith on the other side, and would be considered as mingling insult with injury. It would furnish a motive and a pretext for disregarding a compact, the complete and favorable execution of which it is our interest to require and to excite by our example. And it ought the less to be wished by our citizens, as the sum to be paid by the United States, if distributed among them, would bear so small a proportion to their claims that it could not, according to any just calculation, balance the danger to which these would be subjected by such a precaution. A different course, therefore, has been pursued. The requisitions of Mr. Pichon have been answered by promises of good faith, and of payment as soon as legal provision for it shall be made. He will even be permitted to receive, under the instructions from his Government, the sums due to individuals who do not themselves put in their claims. This is an arrangement not entirely agreeable, but it is pressed with much anxiety, and probably has relations to the armament at St. Domingo which give it a critical value. A refusal of it, therefore, would not only be taken unkindly, but might, by suspicion, be connected with an unfriendly policy charged on the preceding administration towards the French interests in that island."

[Extract.]

"I could wish to know how much (if anything) we are indebted to this Government, as I may, in that case, satisfy some claims by obtaining set-offs. The injury that our country has received by the precipitancy of the last administration, the revocation of the treaty, and the abrogation of the second article in the convention, are incalculable."

"I have, with great difficulty, procured an order for the payment of Archambal's bills, for the Trumbull and Olive, after the owners had waited here six months, and then without interest or damages. The demand of the Pigou is, I hope, also in the way of payment.

"As to the contract demands, the Minister of Marine told me I might as well ask him to cut off his father's head as to ask payment.

"However, on this subject, I shall be better informed when they reply to my note. I believe that they may possibly put the debt upon their 5 per cent. loan, which is now at 57, but will, in that case, fall considerably; so that, at most, the creditor, after waiting many years, will sink half his debt; but, as they hint, necessity has no law. Their expenses exceed their income, and the Government is at this moment maintained by anticipations, at an interest of from 12 to 18 per cent."

No. 456.

The Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States at Paris to the Minister of Exterior Relations of the French Republic, dated Paris, March 25, 1802.

SIR: I have been honored by your note of the 29th Ventose. The high opinion that I entertain of the sound policy and good faith of the French Government permits me only to see, in those parts of it which differ from the principles I have laid down, errors, either in my own judgment, or misconstructions into which you may have been led by a cursory view of the subject while involved in the variety of important concerns that necessarily engage your attention. These errors or misconceptions, either on your part or on mine, will, I flatter myself, sir, be removed by a free and candid discussion.

You admit that the 1st, 2d, and 5th classes of credits, mentioned in the note to which you reply, are of the nature of those for whose payment the Governments reciprocally undertake to provide by the 5th article of the convention; that is to say, that all debts contracted by either Government with the citizens of the other shall, agreeably to the first part of that article, be paid by the Government to such citizens; while the contracts of individuals, to which the Government is neither party nor privy, must be pursued in the usual course of law. I have the satisfaction of finding, sir, that you also agree with me in admitting that all those claims which result from the order, or have been authorized by the Government fall within the purview of that article which expressly stipulates that debts of this nature shall be paid. In which sense, I presume, I am to understand the words "d'entre dans la masse des compensations." As to what are authorized by the Government, having already expressed my sentiments, and not finding them contested in your note, I flatter myself that they accord with yours; while, on the other hand, I am ready to admit the public cannot be bound by the contracts of unauthorized individuals, except where they adopt their acts by drawing to themselves a benefit under them. I am sorry that my construction of the second article of the convention, and of their reference to it in the ratification of it by the French Government, does not agree with yours. You will recollect, sir, that the 2d article owed its birth to claims founded upon provisions contained in treaties previously existing between the two nations. That the Government of France was willing to admit those claims, provided the connexion created by those treaties were re-established; but that the Commissioners of the United States conceiving they were not empowered to treat on this subject, it was mutually agreed to suspend the negotiation relative to both those objects, and that, in the meantime, property captured and not then finally condemned should be mutually restored.

The qualified ratification can certainly extend only to the objects of the article, and puts an end to a discussion that was only postponed. For the accuracy of this statement, sir, I refer you to documents in your own possession, and to every transaction relative to this article during the negotiation, for proof that the indemnities there spoken of were intended to be confined to indemnities for captures and condemnations only where the cases had been finally decided on, without the smallest reference to vessels that France retained in her ports at great expense to the proprietors, with a view to her own particular advantage in the application of the cargo, or when a national object induced a general embargo. The injustice of placing this loss, sustained for general and national purposes, upon strangers who had no common interest with the nation, is so manifest that I persuade myself the idea never entered the mind of the negotiators on either side, and that you were led into this construction merely by the generality of the terms used in the second article, without revolving, so fully as I flatter myself you will now do, the circumstances upon which it was founded. If, however, sir, any doubts could be entertained on this subject, we should find an easy exposition of them, first, in the conduct of every board authorized to settle the claims of foreigners, who have uniformly admitted their justice and liquidated them; and, second, in the fifth article of the convention, which expressly stipulates for the payment of every debt contracted by the public, except those claimed "pour des captures ou pour des condemnations." It is certain, sir, that this exception could only be predicated upon the second article, and that it was, of course, intended to embrace every case contained therein; otherwise the second and fifth articles would be directly opposed to each other, the one suspending and the other directing the payment; for if, as the article supposes, the words "the debts contracted by one of the two nations" were sufficiently large to include even captures and condemnations, they must obviously have extended to indemnities resulting from such national acts as have always been considered as creating a debt in those who derived advantages under them. I dismiss this subject, sir, with this single reflection: that the greater part of these demands being claimed on the original contract, or on vessels and cargoes acquitted, or not finally condemned, (about which there can be no dispute,) the amount of the remainder is too insignificant to be contested by the Government of France. If a single doubt hangs upon the meaning of the article it will add to the national reputation for justice and good faith, on easy terms, to construe it with the liberality that influences delicate minds when called upon to judge their own causes. The claims I have arranged under the 4th head, and for which you call for a more specific demonstration, will, I believe, be better referred to the consideration I am about to give to the observations you have honored me with on the subject of prizes, and which I shall take up in a separate note.

The principle upon which the accounts are to be liquidated, in most instances admitting of no doubt, by confining your answer, sir, to this object only, you have passed by the most material inquiries in my note, and to which I must again request an early reply, to wit: what is meant by entering into the "mass of compensation," or, rather, when, and in what manner that compensation is to be made? and what interest is to be allowed on the capital retained for years in the hands of the French Government? Many of these debts have already been formally settled by the officers appointed for that purpose. Partial payments have been made to some; to others bills of exchange, to the full amount, have been given by the Government. These bills have returned protested. Can it be necessary, sir, to reliquidate those accounts? Or can there be a doubt whether Government pay its own bills with interest, without any further loss of time in re-reliquidations? If one settlement of the account does not suffice, what security will the creditor have that the third and fourth will not be demanded? and, in short, that the expense in time and money, in attendance on new boards and new systems, will not absorb the value of his demand? I submit also to you, sir, whether, when funds are prepared for the payment of the debt, it is just to make those whose accounts are liquidated wait the settlement of accounts with others? The demand of each creditor is distinct and stands upon its own contract; and his right to payment is established as soon as his accounts are settled. On the subject of interest, sir, you are totally silent, though it certainly makes an important part of my application. When you reflect on the time during which creditors have been deprived of their capital, or the interest they might have made of it, or the inconveniences they have suffered by long and ruinous solicitations, and on the advantages that France has derived from the use of their principal, I think there can be no sort of doubt that an interest of six per cent. should be granted upon their demand from the time the debt became due.

The board of comptability, as I am told, are duly sensible of this, and are only restrained from granting it by the want of legal authority. I must, therefore, pray the Government to take measures for such an extension of the powers of this board as will enable them to do full justice to the public creditors. But, sir, it is not enough to say that debts shall be liquidated, and enter into the mass of compensation, without pointing out how or when they shall be paid. The 5th article of the treaty says expressly they shall be paid; but justice and good faith say it independent of the treaty. Yet they remain unsatisfied; nor is the most distant hope, as yet, afforded them by your note of when or how they will be paid. In my note on the subject of Louisiana I have hinted at a mode of discharging a part of them that would be advantageous to France, not only in a financial but in a political point of view. How far the informal note I had the honor to put into your hands may serve as a basis for some plan that may be acceptable to both nations I know not, but I wish it to be considered in its present form rather as a naked hint than a direct or authorized proposition, and by no means to break in upon any arrangement the Government proposes to make for the payment of our demands.

Having been deceived myself, I believe your Government also to be deceived as to the amount of American claims. They are in fact so trifling as to make the paying them or funding them, at the highest rate of interest, an object of little moment in a financial view, but of infinite importance in a political one. While this debt floats it will be much greater in opinion than it is in reality. It will present to the affrighted stranger and the ignorant citizen the picture of national bankruptcy, and will palsy every attempt to restore public credit. And the dread inspired by the example of men ruined by their confidence in the Government will not only weaken that confidence, but entering into every money transaction between the Government and the individual, must, in one year, cost more to France in the enhancement of prices than would have served to satisfy the whole debt. I must, then, again, sir, repeat my request that so much of the debt as has been fully liquidated, and about which there can be no dispute, be immediately paid, or at least by instalments. In this class fall bills drawn by the Government, or contracts acknowledged, and on which partial payments have already been made; that funds be prepared for the payment of the remainder of the debt as it is liquidated; that the Treasury or the commission of comptability be directed to add the interest to the principal; and that I may be enabled at an early day to declare the intentions of the French Government with respect to objects so important to the citizens of the United States, and to the restoration of confidence and harmony between both countries.

I repeat, &c.

ROBERT R. LIVINGSTON.

No. 457.

Proposition submitted by Mr. Livingston to the French Republic, [without date.]

American debt, the means and manner of discharging it with the smallest inconvenience to France.

It is understood that the Batavian Republic is indebted to France upwards of 20,000,000 of florins. Let a loan be opened in Paris by the Batavian Republic for a sum not exceeding that amount, under the direction of her minister.

Let American debt when liquidated be subscribed to this loan, (which France must guaranty;) let such payments, by instalments, be agreed upon as are most convenient to Batavia, even prolonging them beyond the periods agreed upon with France, and the interest of six per cent. per annum be paid quarterly at Amsterdam upon the loan; let the American minister at Paris be considered as agent for the creditors, and his signature to the loan be accompanied with an acquittance of the debt, to be by him signed and lodged with the Minister of the Treasury of France.

The United States, in consideration of the present demands upon France for money, and to facilitate her operations in the islands, and as a mark of her friendship, will, at the same time, permit her to open a loan within their territories for five million of livres, at six per cent. interest, to be secured by the guaranty of the United States, payable by instalments after ten years.

The advantage of this plan to France will be the discharge of debts which every consideration of justice honor, and policy, require her to pay; the actual profit arising from the recovery of her credit in the purchases she is compelled to make; the receiving an immediate payment from Batavia instead of a distant one, since the debts discharged must be considered as so much money; the receipt of 5,000,000 livres, which will be more than equivalent in the purchases she is compelled to make in America, to twice that amount, if she makes them on credit, supposing it even possible, which is very doubtful to make them at all without remitting money, which it would not be very convenient to do.

The advantage Batavia will receive will be, that her loan will be effected with facility without breaking in upon the capital she requires to revive her commerce;

That the terms of payment will be convenient to her;

That mutual exchanges will take place between her citizens and those of the United States for the sums they respectively hold in each other's funds; so that, ultimately, no money will be drawn from either country.

The advantage to America will be the reimbursement of an active capital to her citizens.

The mutual advantage of France and the United States will be the restoration of good faith, friendship, confidence, and commerce between them.

ROBERT R. LIVINGSTON.

"The House of Representatives have passed unanimously the appropriation for the French convention, and the Senate will no doubt pass it with as little delay as their forms will permit, and probably with unanimity also."

No. 459.

Mr. Livingston to the Minister of Exterior Relations of the French Republic, [marked, sent in April 17, 1802.]

SIR: I have hitherto delayed replying to your observations on the subject of prizes, because, considering it as a matter of comparatively less moment, I did not wish to break in upon the time you were about to afford to the more important subject of the demands for debts due from the French Government to American citizens. In the note you did me the honor to write on the 17th Germinal you inform me that you have presented a report on this subject to the First Consul; and as I have every reliance upon his justice, upon the manner in which you would naturally present this object to his consideration, and upon the resources of the French Government, I shall patiently wait his decision which will doubtless be made at an early day, and while the session of the Legislature enables him to recommend the laws that may be necessary for the satisfactory termination of this business.

I am sorry, sir, that we should still continue to think differently on the subject of the indemnities. The fifth article appears to me to go much further than your construction of it is willing to admit. It expressly stipulates that all debts due by either Government to the individuals of the other shall be paid. But as this would also have included the indemnities for captures and condemnations previously made—and it was the intention of the contracting parties, by the second article, to preclude this payment as depending on a future negotiation—it was necessary to except from this promise of payment all that made the subject of the second article. The exception, therefore, must be considered as a complete explanation of the extent of the word "indemnities" in that article; and the whole of the fifth article, taken together, amounts to an express stipulation to pay every debt due to individuals, except such as they might claim for indemnities for captures and condemnations, and must have been so construed had the 2d article continued in the treaty. On its being erased the 5th article stands alone as a promise to pay, with the single exception of indemnities for captures and condemnations. It will, sir, be well recollected by the distinguished characters who had the management of the negotiation that the payment for illegal captures, with damages and indemnities, was demanded on one side, and the renewal of the treaty of 1778 on the other; that they were considered as of equivalent value, and that they only formed the subject of the 2d article; and that, as to the payment of indemnities for embargoes, in consequence of the cargoes being put in requisition, or with a view to any other political measure which carried with it nothing hostile to the United States, no controversy ever arose between the plenipotentiaries of the two nations.

I am ready, sir, on the other hand, to admit the justice of your remark so far as relates to indemnities for captures and condemnations which had been made previous to the signature of the treaty; and that, as to such parts of my note on the subject of prizes as relate to this object, I acknowledge that my demand cannot be supported by the convention.

Permit me, sir, now to observe that while you limit the treaty to the narrowest possible construction in one part, you allow to the Council of Prizes a latitude which renders it nugatory on the other. You say that the Council of Prizes are not only to govern themselves by the rules prescribed by the convention, but by those maritime regulations that all nations agree to observe with respect to each other; and you instance the case of the ship Winyaw as one in which they were authorized not only to examine whether the ship had the papers required by the convention, but such others as tended to prove that she was not American property.

The rule, I believe, sir, laid down by the best writers for the construction of treaties is, that, as to the subject-matter of the treaty, no reference is to be had to the laws of nations, but the case is to be governed by the rules prescribed by the treaty. Were it otherwise, all treaties would be nugatory, because the laws of nations are, in themselves, liable to an infinity of constructions, and it is to avoid discussions on the subject of them that treaties are commonly made. Your courts, sir, certainly professed to be governed by the maritime laws of nations in the condemnations that laid the first foundation for the differences that unhappily prevailed between our respective Governments, while the United States appealed from their decisions to the same laws. The maritime law and the law of nations is one thing in France, another in England, and a third in Algiers; and treaties are made with each by other nations, either to overrule or to give a common explanation to this law, of which each claims his own to be the best exposition.

The treaty has expressly declared what shall be evidence of American property, and, this evidence having been furnished, the Council of Prizes have no right to look further. Had the Winyaw wanted those papers, which the treaty declares to be conclusive evidence, she must then have been adjudged by the law of nations; because, in that case, there would have been no other rule. This distinction, sir, is the only one that can render treaties of any avail. Depart from it a moment, and there is no barrier to stop your courts from proceeding all the length they did before the signature of the convention. If the papers of the Winyaw were fraudulently given by the Government of the United States, it affords a just cause of complaint, and the Government of France has a right to demand an explanation on the subject; but while the treaty is held to be in force, courts, who have no right to look beyond the treaty, are bound to conform to its provisions. If, on the other hand, these papers were fraudulently obtained from the American Government, they alone have a right to punish the offence, even though France should remotely suffer by it. And if this was the case (for which I candidly acknowledge there appears to be some color) it would have been the duty of the court to have collected the evidence, and to have made a representation of the facts to their Government, who would have transmitted them to that of the United States; in the meantime, either returning the vessel for their decision, or sending her to them for trial. The laws of the United States would not have suffered the offence to go unpunished; and their generosity would have led them to bestow on the captors the amount of the forfeitures received by the Government. You pass, by, sir, the other cases which made the subject of my several notes. The cases of the Ann and the Commerce suggested the idea of a reference to the Council of Cassation; not on the general merits of the cause, but on single and nice points of law, to wit: whether they were to be classed under the head of vessels which had been finally condemned; and that because the forms of this court would have admitted a solemn and public argument, while the Council of Prizes, which is rather to be considered as a Board of State than as a court of law, is governed by other rules. Without, however, pretending to insist upon a measure which I conclude, from your note, to be inconsistent with those that the Government have found most expedient, I would only pray that those cases which carry with them a great degree of hardship may be reconsidered, under such directions as the Government (to whose revision Courts of Admiralty, specially constituted, are usually subjected) may think it just to give. I need hardly use any arguments to enforce the same request in favor of the Rodolph Fredrick, whose condemnation can certainly not be justified by the convention, nor by the maritime code of any nation.

The request contained in my note, relative to the giving up of vessels, by order of the Government, without the interference of courts, you have convinced me, sir, would be attended with inconveniences if extended beyond the cases of vessels taken since the signature of the convention; and it is of less moment relative to them, as I have yet heard of but two such cases, the Nancy and the Hope. In the first the Council of Prizes have decided in the manner that I wished the Government to do; so that the only remaining case is that of the Hope; in which, sir, I flatter myself with the interference of Government upon the statement already given.

I have had occasion to mention the manner in which ships, liberated under the convention, are acquitted. The decisions of the courts not only go to throw upon the owners all the injuries they have sustained by the capture and delay in French ports, but all expenses which have been incurred, not by them, but by those who brought them into port.

This, in many instances, renders the decree nugatory; since the expenses frequently amount to more than the value of the ship and cargo, as I have had the honor to convince you by the exhibition of bills that on a brig amount to 195,000fs. The convention directs that they shall be given up; but it in no part justifies the burdening of the ship with any costs or charges. These must necessarily fall upon those who occasioned them, and not upon the unoffending neutral. It would otherwise have been better that there had been no treaty relative to them; since, in that case, if not legally taken, they would have been entitled to costs and damages. If the Government shall be pleased to recommend to the Council of Prizes a revision of the cases I have mentioned, or prescribe rules conformable to what the treaty appears to me to direct, I shall, sir, trouble you for the earliest information, that I may apprise the parties to be prepared for their hearing, and give my Government the satisfaction of learning the readiness with which that of France attends to every object which promotes the harmony that happily subsists between the two nations.

I am, &c.,

R. R. LIVINGSTON.

No. 460.

Mr. Madison, Secretary of State of the United States, to Mr. Livingston, dated Department of State, Washington, May 1, 1802.

[Extract.]

"The conduct of the French Government, in paying so little attention to its obligations under the treaty, in neglecting its debts to our citizens, in giving no answers to your complaints and expostulations, which you say is the case with those of other foreign ministers, also and particularly in its reserve as to Louisiana, which tacitly contradicts the language first held to you by the Minister of Foreign Relations, gives tokens as little auspicious to the true interests of France herself, as to the rights and just objects of the United States. We have the better ground to complain of this conduct, as it is so much at variance with the example given by the Government here. The appropriation was no sooner carried through the legislative forms, than the settlement of French claims under the treaty commenced; and with the advantage of every facility that could be afforded on our part, in ascertaining them; and, as Mr. Pichon was authorized to receive those due to individuals not applying, the whole amount has been already discharged, excepting in a very few cases which may require further examination. The claims were liquidated according to the net proceeds of the sales, as heretofore intimated to you, although it is still believed that restitution, according to the gross amount or value at the time of capture, not only would be more favorable to the United States, but more just in itself. The payment to Mr. Pichon, without a special power from the claimants, was by no means the choice of the President; but was so much pressed, as a test of the disposition of this country towards the French Republic, at a critical moment, that it could not be properly refused. The sum received by him is $140,841 25. That paid to individuals is $74,667 41.

"It is proper to observe to you, that in all cases where sales were made by the American captors prior to the date of the convention, without the trial and condemnation requisite, we have admitted the title to restitution without regarding the lapse of time between the capture and the convention, or making a question how far cases of that description were within the contemplation of the instrument. You, will, of course, avail yourself of this proceeding on the part of the United States, to enforce a correspondent rule in their favor, in case a different one should be contended for by the French Government. You will not fail to insist, also, if occasion should require, that, in cases where the time allowed for appeals had not run out at the date of the convention, it could not be necessary for the claimants afterwards to enter appeals. The convention, by recognizing all claims not barred by final condemnation at its date, evidently rescued them from all further subjection to judicial investigation.

"The cession of Louisiana to France becomes daily more and more a source of painful apprehensions. Notwithstanding the treaty of March, 1801, and notwithstanding the general belief in France on the subject, and the accounts from St. Domingo that part of the armament sent to that island were eventually destined for Louisiana, a hope was still drawn from your early conversations with Mr. Talleyrand, that the French Government did not mean to pursue the object. Since the receipt of your last communications, no hope remains, but from the accumulating difficulties of going through with the undertaking, and from the conviction you may be able to impress, that it must have an instant and powerful effect in changing the relations between France and the United States. The change is obvious; and the more it can be developed, in candid and friendly appeals to the reflections of the French Government, the more it will urge it to revise and abandon the project. A mere neighborhood could not be friendly to the harmony which both countries have so much an interest in cherishing; but if a possession of the mouth of the Mississippi is to be added to other causes of discord, the worst events are to be apprehended. You will, consequently, spare no efforts that will consist with prudence and dignity, to lead the councils of France to proper views of this subject, and to an abandonment of her present purpose. You will also pursue, by prudent means, the inquiry into the extent of the cession, particularly whether it includes the Floridas, as well as New Orleans; and endeavor to ascertain the price at which these, if included in the cession, would be yielded to the United States. I cannot, in the present state of things, be more particular on this head than to observe that, in every view, it would be a most precious acquisition, and that, as far as the terms could be satisfied by charging on the acquisition itself the restitution and other debts to American citizens, great liberality would doubtless be indulged by this Government. The President wishes you to devote every attention to this object, and to be frequent and particular in your communications relating to it."

No. 462.

Mr. Madison, Secretary of State of the United States, to Mr. Charles Pinckney, Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States to Spain, dated Department of State, May 11, 1802.

SIR: My last was of the 30th of March. We are still without a line from you * * * with a prudent zeal the task committed to you.

With sentiments of great respect, &c., &c.,

JAMES MADISON.

(Vide volume 2, Foreign Relations, page 517.)

No. 463.

The Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States at Paris to the French Minister of Exterior Relations, dated May 18, 1802.

SIR: It is not without extreme reluctance that I again call your attention to the notes I have presented to you on the subject of the claims of the citizens of the United States, as well on account of debts acknowledged to be due to them as on account of the decisions in the Council of Prizes, of which I have had reason to complain.

I see, sir, in all the declarations of the Government, and in those of the members of the Legislature, such just and forcible expressions on the subject of national faith and the importance of public credit, that I cannot permit myself to doubt their ultimate intention to realize, by their practice, the theory which adds such lustre to their eloquence.

But, sir, in the meantime, I see no step taken to accomplish this promise with respect to my distressed fellow-citizens; on the contrary, I find every possible obstruction thrown in their way; first in the liquidation of their debts, and next in affording a fund for their payment, when, after a tedious and expensive process, the debt is liquidated. I see the Board of Comptability extending to part of them a law which, at the present price of stock, would rob them of five-sixths of their capital; a law which repeated declarations of past Legislatures have shown not to have been intended to comprise foreigners, and in which they could not have been comprised without the most flagrant violation of public faith, but which, in every event, is superseded by the fifth article of the treaty, which expressly stipulates for the discharge of their debt.

I see the commercial capital of my fellow-citizens, the only means of their subsistence, withheld from them till the interest is equal to the principal sum; and yet no allowance made for that interest in the liquidation of the account. I see others of them, after sustaining heavy losses by the destruction committed at St. Domingo, compelled to become creditors of France by an act of power. And while the agent of France in America is declaring to the Government of the United States that every measure of justice is afforded by the prize courts to the claimants here, I see those very claimants reduced to beggary by their decisions.

While I am unable to obtain satisfaction for creditors who are already here, and find my breast wrung by the distresses of men who have wasted their substance and their time in prosecuting their claims through a series of tribunals, I am in hourly expectation of seeing another set of creditors arrive with fresh demands for property wrested from them by violence, or voluntarily given, from too fond a reliance on the assurances of agents who seek new credits by circulating in America reports of satisfaction given to the old. If those demands, grounded in the strictest justice and confirmed by a solemn convention, have hitherto been treated with neglect, on what foundation can I place the new ones that will entitle them to equal attention? Can it be possible, sir, that France, great, rich, and powerful, as she is, should not have the means of satisfying the comparatively insignificant demands of the American creditors, while she is placing the debt due to her own citizens upon the most stable foundation, and astonishing the world with the magnitude of her undertakings? Can armies and fleets, sir, be sent to a distant quarter of the globe so totally unprovided as to make it necessary to violate the rights of a friendly nation, to seize upon her commercial capital, and enrol an additional number of her citizens in the list of hopeless creditors? Though I readily admit that the just sense that the French Government entertains for her national credit and resources affords every prospect of a future payment, yet you will, sir, as readily allow that a distant payment is no compensation, either to the United States or to their citizens, for the actual inactivity of their capital. You will also admit, sir, that the attempt to include the American creditor in the list of those who have had two-thirds of their debt struck off, and the total silence of the Boards with respect to the interest, are not calculated to inspire confidence or revive credit. If not, sir, you must feel that it is the duty of the American Government to apprise its merchants of the actual situation of their fellow-citizens, who are now, and have been for years past, soliciting their just dues in France. And it is my duty, sir, to enable them to do this by requiring some more full and explicit answer than I have yet been honored with on the subject of our demands.

Permit me then, sir, to solicit an early reply to the following inquiries:

1. As the Government of France cannot mean to include the American citizens who furnished her with supplies, on contracts made with her Government or their agents, previous to the 25th Frimaire, an 6, in the class of creditors who are compelled to subscribe to the tiers consol, and thereby deprive them of two-thirds of their debt, and then, according to the present value of stock, of near half the remainder; or, in other words, as the Government of France, after having received, in times of the greatest necessity, the full amount of the claim, cannot mean to discharge it by the payment of little more than one-sixth, I beg to be informed whether it would not accord with their views to instruct the Board of Comptability, that the convention is a law which should be respected in the settlement of the accounts, and that by that convention it is expressly stipulated that the debts contracted by one nation with the individuals of the other shall be paid?

2. I would also again repeat the request made in my former notes on the subject of interest, and I desire to be informed whether, if any law is necessary to enable that Board to liquidate so just a demand, it will not be proper to obtain such law before the rising of the Legislature? If no law is necessary, I beg to know whether the Government has given, or will give, the Board instructions on that head? You will easily see, sir, how necessary it is, as well for the present holders of the debt as for those who may be disposed to give credit in future, to be well apprised of the principles of the Government on this subject.

3. I take the liberty, sir, further to ask, in pursuance of a request contained in a former note, whether it is intended that the system hitherto pursued in the island of St. Domingo is to be continued? Whether the property of American citizens, trading with French ports, is in future to be taken at a limited price, and the payment to be made in bills on France? I am persuaded, sir, that you will think this question sufficiently interesting to the United States to justify the inquiry I make, and to merit an early reply.

4. I beg leave, further, sir, to ask whether the Government have yet formed, or are about to form, any arrangement for the payment of the American debt? And at what period we may hope for its final discharge? And whether arrangements are made for paying the bills given to our citizens at St. Domingo as soon as they shall become due, and what the nature of those arrangements are?

On the subject of prizes, sir, I can only repeat my request for determinations on the cases I have particularly submitted, and for general directions to the Council of Prizes on the mode of acquittal, which shall prevent the abuses complained of in a note I have had the honor to present.

I cannot close this letter, sir, without affording you the satisfaction of knowing what has been done in the United States towards carrying the treaty into effect.

You are already apprised, sir, that, in restoring the French national ship the Berceau, the Government of the United States did not content themselves with restoring her in the state she was, but expended a very considerable sum of money in giving her a complete repair.

When my last advices came away, the House of Congress had passed a bill for putting into the hands of the President three hundred and —— thousand dollars, which sum, I am informed by the Secretary of State, instead of being retained (as it justly might, and as the American merchants requested) until the claims upon it are duly authenticated, will be immediately placed in the hands of Mr. Pichon, who will have the use of it, until it is applied for by the proprietors under the treaty, and who will be thereby enabled to facilitate the operations of the French commanders in the islands. I trust, sir, that the Government of France will know how to appreciate this act of cordiality and confidence, and that it will derive with them an additional value from its being voluntary, and beyond what the treaty or good faith required of them, and that, too, at a moment when our own citizens had most reason to complain, not only of the inexecution of the treaty, but of the actual violation of their commercial rights.

Accept, sir, the assurance of my most perfect consideration.

I am, &c.,

ROBERT R. LIVINGSTON.

Mr. Livingston to the Secretary of State of the United States, dated May 20, 1802.

[Extract.]

"The rule here in acquitting is to give no damages; to load the vessel with all the charges, and to restore her in the state she is. You have a copy of my note on that subject to the minister. I submit it to you, if this is the case, whether you should not adopt the same rule, and whether the expenses employed on the Berceau should not make charges against the Government? I have heard nothing here relative to a claim for the Insurgente, and I am inclined to think it has been set up to afford a pretence to retain the money that will, by your promise, go into Pichon's hands, and, at the same time, to leave open the claims of individuals, under the treaty, against us. You will judge how far it will be proper, if you give him the money, to exemplify every particular claim, and to take a discharge as to such claim. Though I must own that I should have preferred retaining it as a kind of security for payments here, at least till some specific plan had been chalked out for their discharge; for, in fact, it would have gone far to have satisfied our demands against the Government for captures and condemnations, because the greater part of them will be recoverable from the individuals or satisfied by the mere restitution of the vessel and cargoes. As you have, however, determined otherwise, I have thought it best to derive the merit you intended from it, and have accordingly so mentioned it in the enclosed note.

"I yesterday called on the minister and had a long conversation with him on the subject of our demands; in which all I could get from him was an assurance that it was under consideration; and have, therefore, determined to bring him to something decisive by the note. This he will be compelled to answer; besides that it will fall under the Consul's eye."

"A report for the discharge of our demands is before the First Consul. If adopted, it is all I can ask; more than I hoped. It is very pointed as to the justice of our claim, and the national disgrace that would attend its further neglect."

No. 466.

Mr. Madison, Secretary of State of the United States, to Mr. Livingston, dated Department of State, October 15, 1802.

[Extract.]

"The zeal and energy with which you are urging on the French Government, a fair construction and fulfilment of the convention, and a discharge of all our just demands, render it unnecessary to repeat to you our anxiety that the example of good faith given by the United States should not remain without a satisfactory reciprocity. The precise tone in your communications most likely to favor this result can best be decided by your own judgment. In a general view, the soundest policy evidently prescribes one that will cherish whatever good will or confidence may be felt towards the United States, and will charge on that side the blame of any failure in the pursuit of our objects. It must be left to your own decision, also, how far a direct resort to the head of the Government may promise better success than the ordinary channels of communicating with him. The delays and obstacles met with in the latter recommend the experiment if there be no objections to it drawn from usage or other considerations, not perceived at this distance. The experiment, which will, of course, be made with as little danger as possible of needless umbrage to the intermediate organ, may, at least, lead to a knowledge of the ground finally meant to be taken by the Chief Consul, and to which the further instructions of the President must be accommodated.

"The suspense which has taken place in relation to Louisiana and the Floridas is favorable to the efforts for diverting the French Government from its unwise project. Whether we regard the sentiments prevailing in this country on the subject, or the striking tendencies of the project itself, no pains ought to be spared for putting an end to it. If the occasion can be so improved as to obtain for the United States, on convenient terms, New Orleans and Florida, the happiest of issues will be given to one of the most perplexing of occurrences. I postpone more particular remarks on this subject until the President shall know the impressions on the French councils, resulting from the views of it to which you will be led by the despatches of which Mr. Dupont was the bearer."

"The treaty I propose might also form a basis for the immediate discharge of the debts due to our citizens; in the doing of which advantageous arrangements may be made, and, at the same time, the funds of France be considerably raised, provided that such secrecy is observed in the whole of this transaction as will prevent the debts being made the objects of speculation, other than such as the First Consul shall authorize. I know, sir, a distinction has been taken between debts due from the former Government and that which now happily prevails in France. But, sir, if this distinction is just, it does not apply to the demands of the United States; they were specifically assumed by the new Government when they made them the object of the treaty, and an equivalent has already been paid to the present Government by that of the United States; so that they stand upon different ground from the debts of other nations having demands on France; and they not only have to plead their justice, and the circumstances under which they were contracted, but the pledged faith of the existing Government."

"Mr. Monroe will be the bearer of the instructions under which you are jointly to negotiate. The object of them will be to procure a cession of New Orleans and the Floridas to the United States, and consequently the establishment of the Mississippi as the boundary between the United States and Louisiana. In order to draw the French Government into the measure, a sum of money will make part of our propositions, to which will be added such regulations of the commerce of that river, and of the others entering the Gulf of Mexico, as ought to be satisfactory to France. From a letter received by the President from the respectable person alluded to in my last, it is inferred with probability that the French Government is not averse to treat on those grounds. And such a disposition must be strengthened by the circumstances of the present moment.

"I have thought it proper to communicate thus much to you without waiting for the departure of Mr. Monroe, who will not be able to sail for two weeks, or perhaps more. I need not suggest to you that, in disclosing this diplomatic arrangement to the French Government, and preparing the way for the object of it, the utmost care is to be used in repressing extravagant anticipations of the terms to be offered by the United States, particularly of the sum of money to be thrown into the transaction. The ultimatum on this point will be settled before the departure of Mr. Monroe, and will be communicated by him. The sum hinted at in the letter to the President, above referred to, is ———— livres. If less will not do, we are prepared to meet it; but it is hoped that less will do, and that the prospect of accommodation will concur with other motives in postponing the expedition to Louisiana. For the present, I barely remark that a proposition made to Congress with shut doors is under consideration, which, if agreed to, will authorize a payment of about ten millions of livres, under arrangements of time and place, that may be so convenient to the French Government, as to invite a prompt as well as favorable decision in the case. The sum to which the proposition is limited, and which will probably not be effectually concealed, may, at the same time, assist in keeping down the pecuniary expectations of the French Cabinet."

No. 469.

Mr. Livingston to the Minister of Exterior Relations of the French Republic, without date, but endorsed, "Received in R. R. Livingston's, January 24, 1803."

The undersigned, Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States, to his Excellency the Minister of Exterior Relations:

SIR: I have so often had occasion to mention to you the claims of American citizens upon the French Government, and with so little effect, that I feel pain whenever I am compelled to touch upon that subject; but, sir, I never had reason to doubt, both from the tenor of your note and conversations, that it would become a question whether these debts, just in themselves, and confirmed by a treaty, should become the subject of liquidation—the Board of Comptability accordingly proceeded to liquidate and give certificates for about one quarter of the whole amount. The debt so liquidated, the American merchant was enabled to raise the small sums necessary for his support, till arrangements were made, (which they never permitted themselves to doubt,) would be finally done for their discharge. But, sir, even of this, suppose they are now deprived, for though the Board has proceeded to liquidate most of their claims, the gentleman at the head of the Department refuses to give the usual certificates, under what pretence I am at a loss to conceive. I am told he considers the treaty as applying to debts contracted only under the present Government, when, in fact, no such debts existed at the time of the treaty, nor is there a word in the treaty which authorizes such construction—the whole treaty referring to matters that had passed, not only under the Government that had preceded the present, but under that which preceded the Revolution. Upon what other principle has the United States, with the strictest good faith, paid the debts contracted under Louis XVI, and those which the existing Government demanded under the late convention for injuries sustained under the late Directors?

It is time, sir, that matters should be brought to some issue; that the citizens of the United States and their Government should know how far the treaty is binding upon France, and what construction ought to be given to it; for hitherto it has only served as a means to surprise their good faith, and to involve both the Government and the people of the United States in fresh expenses.

I have the honor to renew to your excellency the assurances of my high consideration.

The Minister of Exterior Relations to Mr. Livingston, dated Paris, 19th Ventose, year 11, (March 9, 1803.)

[Translation.]

SIR: The First Consul, in remitting to me the memoir which you have presented to him, has ordered me to assure you that he had taken into serious consideration the objects you therein treat upon, and the divers demands which you have addressed to him.

He has, at the same time, caused a report to be made of all the affairs which have relation to these demands, and to the clauses of the last convention between France and the United States, to which you refer them. The intention of the First Consul, (and he has charged me to declare it to you,) is, that this convention in all its clauses be punctually and scrupulously executed.

The reflections, which in your memoir refer to the difficulties of this execution in regard to France, do not apply, with any sort of foundation, either to the dispositions of the Government of the Republic, or to the situation of its finances. The First Consul is persuaded that the presumptions, which have deceived you on this point, were suggested to you by benevolent disquietude; these presumptions, however, do not agree with the facts. There are no financial embarrassments in France; the French Government has the means as well as the desire to be just; and were they to find themselves so placed that the discharge of their engagements would be to them a painful duty to fulfil, they can rise above difficulties, and satisfy all legitimate claims against them.

As to the subject of American debts, an estimate whereof you give in the memoir addressed to the First Consul, I must acknowledge that it is quite new to us that by any estimate they could amount to the sum of twenty millions. The First Consul charges me to ask of you an exact, full, complete, and verified statement of those debts. The perfect confidence wherewith you have inspired him does not permit him to doubt that you will give to the discussion of the principles which should form this statement all the discernment of your mind and all the frankness of your character; you must be persuaded, sir, that, upon such a statement, everything will be promptly and accurately settled.

As regards the twelfth question, which you have treated of in your memoir, and which relates to Louisiana, the First Consul was desirous that you should have made it the object of a distinct and separate official note. Affairs of so different a nature ought not to be brought near each other, and still less should they be blended together. It is entirely against the maxims of the Government of the Republic to mix important and delicate political relations with calculations of balances and with pecuniary concerns.

However, the First Consul, appreciating the motives that have led you to insist upon the explanation of the new relations which may exist between the two Republics, charges me to inform you that, being previously acquainted with the interest, premature perhaps, but at bottom natural and plausible, which the United States seem to give to this discussion, he has taken steps to send immediately a Minister Plenipotentiary to America, in order that he may be able, as soon as possible, to send him a report, which will put him in a condition of elucidating everything before he makes his determination upon this object.

Besides, in this circumstance, as in all those which can present an object of discussion between the two Governments, the First Consul desires me to give you, upon his dispositions with regard to the United States, the most positive and the most formal assurances of his attachment to your Republic, his personal esteem and personal consideration for the First Magistrate who presides over it, from a natural sentiment, that as a Frenchman, and as the chief of a nation the most constant and the most ancient friend of the American nation, he takes a pleasure in professing, and of which he will look upon it as a pleasing obligation to afford proofs.

In congratulating myself as being, at this moment, the instrument of the sentiments of the First Consul, permit me to renew to you, sir, the assurance of my high consideration.

Mr. Livingston to the Minister of Exterior Relations of the French Republic, dated March 16, 1803.

[Extract.]

"I have received with great sensibility your note containing the First Consul's reply to that I had the honor to present to him. On the subject of the American claims, the sentiments are such as would naturally be entertained by an enlightened statesman who, after advancing his country to the highest pinnacle of military glory and national prospects, had determined to give permanency to that prosperity by establishing it upon the firm basis of religion, good faith, justice, and national credit. On this subject, sir, I have no doubts, and I am satisfied, that when the claims are brought forward, they will, as you have the goodness to declare, be promptly and fully satisfied."

[Extract.]

"Mr. Talleyrand asked me this day, when pressing the subject, whether we wished to have the whole of Louisiana. I told him no; that our wishes extended only to New Orleans and the Floridas; that the policy of France, however, should dictate, (as I had shown in an official note delivered,) to give us the country above the river Arkansas, in order to place a barrier between them and Canada. He said that if they gave New Orleans, the rest would be of little value, and that he would wish to know 'what we would give for the whole.' I told him that it was a subject I had not thought upon, but that I supposed we should not object to twenty millions, provided our citizens were paid. He told me that this was too low an offer—that he would be glad I would reflect upon it, and tell him to-morrow. I told him that as Mr. Monroe would be in town in two days, I would delay my further offer until I had the pleasure of introducing him."

DEAR SIR: I have just come from the Minister of the Treasury. Our conversation was so important * * * and every moment is precious.

Mr. Monroe will be presented to the Minister to-morrow, when we shall press for as early an audience as possible from the First Consul.

I am, dear sir, with the most respectful consideration, your most obedient, humble servant,

ROBERT R. LIVINGSTON.

Mr. Monroe to the Secretary of State of the United States, dated Paris, April 15, 1803.

"It is said that this Government has resolved to offer us the whole of Louisiana. This was intimated by Mr. Marbois to Mr. Livingston the day after my arrival, and to me since through another channel, as that the decision was formed at St. Cloud the day on which General Bernadotte was ordered to set out to the United States. It was intimated by the former that the First Consul estimated the territory at about 120 millions of livres, 20 of which, or near that sum, being due to our citizens, would of course be paid to them. On being urged to state the lowest terms they would probably take, he said they might possibly be brought to accept 60, with the payment of the debt due our citizens."

No. 3.—Mr. Monroe to Mr. Madison, Secretary of State of the United States, dated April 19, 1803.

[Extract.]

"I dined yesterday with the Minister of Foreign Relations, in company with my colleague, Mr. Marbois, and others. After dinner, Mr. Marbois and myself had much conversation on the subject of my mission, in which he declared, with frankness, an earnest desire to adjust every possible cause of variance with us. He assured me that the First Consul had decided to offer us the whole of Louisiana for one hundred millions and our assumption of the debt due our citizens, which is estimated at about twenty more; that he authorized him to make that proposal to us, and to engage his support of our claim to the Floridas with Spain; that he did believe he might be prevailed on to accept the sixty with the payment of the debt, as above, but not less; and he was fearful, from the peremptory tone of the Consul's character, that if we did not meet him on the ground proposed, he might dismiss the subject from his mind, and with difficulty be brought to take it up again. Mr. Livingston and myself having previously resolved to offer fifty millions, out of which that debt was to be paid, I adhered to that ground."

The Minister of the Public Treasury of France to the Minister of the United States, 10th Floreal, an 11, (April 30, 1803.)

[Extract.—Translation.]

"If, in the event, and against all probability, the sum to be paid does not reach twenty millions, my Government will form no claim upon what may remain.

"Not being able to place these observations in the convention itself, I have made of them the subject of this letter I have the honor to write to you, and if you give it your acquiescence, the answer, by which you will inform me of it, will determine very clearly the spirit of the convention, which I send you; and we shall, in this way, have rendered superfluous many stipulations too embarrassing to express, and the execution of which would infallibly be accompained with very great difficulties."

No. 76.—Mr. Livingston to Mr. Madison, Secretary of State of the United States, dated Paris, May 12, 1803.

[Extract.]

"I have no doubt that it has long been their intention to make the arrangements I proposed, (cession of Louisiana,) in exchange for commercial advantages; a sale has always been disrelished, as I was constantly told by Marbois and Talleyrand, and it is clearly to be inferred from the Consul's note, in answer to my letter; what, however, I believe principally drove them to this measure was the promise which the First Consul had hastily made me to pay our debt fully and promptly, and which he found himself in no situation to fulfil, and yet knew not how to elude, as I pressed it at every turn, and spoke of it to Talleyrand, and to all the Consul's friends; assured them that I had communicated it not only to the Government, but to the creditors, with the declaration that they might firmly rely on it, as no one could believe that a man of the Consul's character, a sovereign and a soldier, could break his word. I told the Minister of the Treasury that, as I owed it to myself to justify what I had said, I thought myself bound to publish my letter to the First Consul, with his answer, and the execution of his solemn engagement. I asked what his enemies would say to such a publication? He replied, Or his friends?"

No. 489.

Mr. Livingston to Mr. Madison, Secretary of State of the United States, dated Paris, June 25, 1803.

[Extract.]

I hope in God that nothing will prevent your immediate ratification (of the conventions of 1803) and without altering a syllable of the terms; if you wish anything changed, ratify unconditionally, and set on foot a new negotiation. Be persuaded that France is sick of the bargain, and that Spain is much dissatisfied, and the slightest pretence will lose you the treaty. Nothing has raised the reputation of our country in Europe so high as the conduct of our Government upon this occasion, both home and abroad."

No. 490.

Mr. Madison, Secretary of State of the United States, to Mr. Monroe, dated Department of State, July 29, 1803.

"For the price to be given for the Floridas you are referred, generally, to the original instructions on this point. Although the change of circumstances lessens the anxiety for acquiring immediately a territory which now, more certainly than ever, must drop into our hands, and notwithstanding the pressure of the bargain with France on our Treasury, yet, for the sake of a peaceable and fair completion of a great object, you are permitted by the President, in case a less sum will not be accepted, to give two millions and a quarter of dollars, the sum heretofore apportioned to this purchase. It will be expected, however, that the whole of it, if necessary, be made applicable to the discharge of debts and damages claimed from Spain, as well those not yet admitted by the Spanish Government as those covered by the convention signed with it by Mr. Pinckney on the 11th day of August, 1802, and which was not ratified by the Senate, because it embraced no more of the just responsibilities of Spain. On the subject of the claims you will hold a strong language. The Spanish Government may be told plainly that they will not be abandoned any further than an impartial tribunal may make exceptions to them. Energy in the appeal to its feelings will not only tend to justice for past wrongs, but to prevent a repetition of them in case Spain should become a party to the present war.

"In arranging the mode, the times, and the priorities, of paying the assumed debts, the case of the Treasury is to be consulted as much as possible; less is not to be done with that view than was enjoined in the case of the French debts to our citizens. The stock to be engaged in the transaction is not to be made irredeemable without a necessity not likely to arise; and the interest, as well as the principal, should be payable at the Treasury of the United States. The only admissible limitation, on the redemption of the stock, is, that the holder shall not be paid off in less than one-fifth or one-fourth of the amount in one year.

"Indemnifications for the violation of our deposit at New Orleans have been constantly kept in view in our remonstrances and demands on that subject. It will be desirable to comprehend them in the arrangement. A distinction, however, is to be made between the positive and specific damages sustained by individuals and the general injuries accruing from that breach of treaty. The latter could be provided for by a gross and vague estimate only, and need not be pressed as an indispensable condition. The claim, however, may be represented as strictly just, and a forbearance to insist on it as as an item in the valuable consideration for which the cession is made. Greater stress may be laid on the positive and specific damages capable of being formally verified by individuals; but there is a point beyond which it may be prudent not to insist even here; especially as the incalculable advantage accruing from the acquisition of New Orleans will diffuse a joy throughout the western country that will drown the sense of these little sacrifices. Should no bargain be made on the subject of the Floridas, our claims of every sort are to be kept in force."

[Extract.]

"The house of Hope & Baring will to-morrow lodge with me the amount, in bills, of the stock they have purchased from the French Government, to be delivered by me, according to the terms of their contract, if the treaty is ratified. I believe that this meets with no delay. Be assured that, were the business to do again, it would never be done; they think we have obtained an immense advantage over them. Though the appearance of war had some influence, it had much less than is ascribed to it. Whenever I mentioned its falling into the hands of England, they admitted the possibility, but insisted that, as it must abide the event of the war, they had no doubt of ultimate success; they would get it back, with the British improvements. Mr. Skipwith still thinks that the American debt will fall much within the 20,000,000 for which we have engaged, and all the fair creditors be fully satisfied—the supposed debt being extremely exaggerated in America."

No. 492.

Mr. Monroe to Mr. Livingston, dated London, August 20, 1803.

Dear Sir: I have received your letter of ——, by Mr. Baring, and avail myself of the earliest opportunity to answer it. I perceive that you have misconceived our powers and instructions in what concerns our transactions with France. Our instructions unite us, our commission does so, as does the act which gives us power over a certain sum of money, to be applied promptly to the object of the negotiation. By the two latter instruments, which would control the former, if there was a variance between them, neither of us has power to act singly, but in case of the death of the other. You will know that this construction prevailed through the whole of what had passed; on what principle, then, is it now supposed to be altered? I can conceive some reasons why, if it is, the power should be considered as vested exclusively in you; not one why exclusively in me. The truth is, it remains in reference to any act to be performed under the commission, precisely where it did at first—that is, in both of us. Had I possessed the power exclusively,

I should never certainly have exercised it by making a prompt payment to the Government of France of the sum in question, in obedience to our instructions, with a view to secure more effectually a compliance with our treaties. Such prompt payment would have formed the basis of every consultation and conference with the ministers of France on the subject. It was owing to the circumstances of our power being joint, to your desire to apply that money to the payment of the debts, and to the pressure of other important considerations, at the moment then, that payment was not made. I am persuaded, had it been done, that we should have avoided the anxiety which we afterwards felt, the details of which were communicated in our joint letter, of June 7, to the Secretary of State; that we should, in fact, have placed beyond all hazard the final execution of the treaties; a result of primary importance to the creditors, since on it alone could we be justified in assuming the payment of their debt by our Government, which they so much desired. It was to remedy that error, on an experience of its ill effects, that I suggested to the ministers Talleyrand or Marbois, an idea of a guarantee to Hope & Co.; so far as depended on me of the sum subjected to our disposition, with a view to promote, on the principles of our treaty and the contract of that company with the French Government, a prompt payment of the amount by the company to that Government. I made this suggestion to those ministers on the evening of the 7th of June, the day on which I called to see the order of their Government to Mr. Pichon for the delivery of the ratification and surrender of the territory; a period, it is true, when our anxiety for the consequences was most excited. I remember, on stating to you, immediately afterwards, what had passed, that you did not hesitate to approve it, though you expressed your satisfaction that the offer was not accepted, as I had supposed was the case. In what I stated I spoke for myself, not for you; observing, that our authority was joint—a fact, however, with which they were well acquainted otherwise. When this subject was revived afterwards, in conversation with Mr. Marbois, at Consul Lebrun's, and he intimated his willingness to receive the guarantee, since he saw that it might then be done with advantage to the completion of the transaction between the two nations, and I assured him that my disposition was the same. I, nevertheless, repeated the remark that our power was joint, but promised to confer with you on the subject, and apprise him of the result. I did confer with you, and finding you indisposed to the object, and he being out of town, left the affair in that state.

I am satisfied, I am still of opinion, that the guarantee of the sum proposed is an expedient and suitable measure, and shall therefore execute it so far as my act can have that effect. All human events are subject to uncertainty; accidents may happen which may put it out of the power of our Government to ratify the treaties, or create the stock within the terms specified; it appears to me to be proper to prevent the possibility of any discussion in such cases, by increasing the disposition as well as the obligation of the French Government to execute them, notwithstanding; and from what I have seen of the integrity and fair dealing of the First Consul and the ministers in this transaction, I am satisfied that the acceptance of the guarantee and payment of the money, which the bankers will make in consequence of it, would produce that effect. I trust that this disposition exists without it; I am persuaded it does; but this would be a fair and honorable mode of acting with them, which, by binding us as well as themselves, might make the result more sure; nor can I discern any solid objection to the measure, since it is not an advance of money by the United States, as you intimate, but simply a guarantee of the treaty which we have lately formed, to the amount of the sum committed to our care for that purpose, on the principles of their contract with it; it will not injure our citizens who are creditors of the French Government, but make the payment of their debts more secure, or at least more steady. Being deeply impressed with this view of the subject, I have annexed such an act to the instrument giving us power over the sum in question, with my signature, as appeared to me to be proper for the purpose, which I forward you herewith; if you approve, you will sign it, and not otherwise.

As the apprehension of delay in the ratification of the treaties and creation of the stock by our Government, which might be produced by various causes, was given as the motive of the anxiety which was expressed by the First Consul after he had ratified them, and this guarantee will give him the command of a considerable portion of the sum stipulated, as will, I doubt not, be deemed so strong a proof of the fair intentions of our Government, as will satisfy him that there is no cause for such apprehensions. Under such circumstances, it is reasonable to expect a declaration on his part, through Mr. Marbois, addressed to us, that he will take no advantage of such delays as are accidental, or such as a sincere desire to execute all the stipulations of the treaties by our Government, according to the principles of good faith, could not prevent. I think it more than probable that our Government will perform every stipulation within the terms specified in the treaties, and that such a stipulation by the First Consul, or declaration, (for the form is not material,) would prove of no effect; as the contrary, however, might be the case, it seems reasonable for us to expect it, especially at the present time, when there are several considerations which make it desirable. I have no doubt that the First Consul will readily accede to the measure, on its being suggested to him, since he will perceive that this is an act in itself just, and that will do him honor; nor have I any doubt that Mr. Marbois and Mr. Talleyrand will suggest it to him, since it is in the spirit of the whole transaction, which has been fair and honorable in the highest degree.

I wish this affair, if you approve, concluded immediately, that it may produce the good effect that is contemplated by it. You will of course see Mr. Marbois, and make the communications and arrangement with him that are suited to either event.

Nothing is more uncertain that whether Spain will be able to preserve her neutrality in the present war; her minister is here still. Nor is there any reason to suppose that he will not remain. Too much caution cannot be observed in our communications on European occurrences, to which you will attribute my not going further into that topic. Happily, we are at present but little interested in them, and I hope we shall continue to be so. I wish you to forward the memorial respecting Mr. Beaumarchais' claim to the Secretary of State. We omitted doing it according to our promise to General Dumas. I have forwarded the letters I brought over from you to our Government, as I did those delivered me by Mr. Baring. I shall pay like attention to any other you may send.

I am, dear sir, with great esteem, &c.,

JAMES MONROE.

No. 493.

Mr. Livingston to Mr. Monroe, dated Paris, September 9, 1803.

DEAR SIR: I intended to have written a long and particular answer to your favor; but, as I am just sending off despatches to America, and the affair to which your letter refers is yet under consideration, I must defer it till the next safe conveyance. I can only tell you, in general terms, that the circumstance gives me the most serious uneasiness, since I never had a doubt that our powers were expended the moment the treaty was signed; and, upon reading the law, I am fully convinced that, after having appropriated, as we have done, the ten millions to the payment of our own citizens, we have no sort of right, either jointly or separately, to engage our Government for more, and that our engagements would not be binding upon them, and, of course, if any circumstance should prevent the ratification, the houses who have given credit on our account would be in danger of losing their money. This, I think, we should, as honest men, inform them of, under such injunctions of secrecy as will prevent our being involved with this Government. I have given my opinion to Mr. ——, who, at my request, communicated it to Mr. ——, when here, but who was, notwithstanding, disposed to accept your guarantee, and advanced two millions in America, on which I wrote the letter you answer. As to the further security you ask here, the Consul has absolutely refused it; he claims your promise as a right that he is not bound to purchase, you having annexed no conditions when you made it, and he alleges that you would not have made it if you had not had powers so to do. Mr. Marbois also insists that you made it to him repeatedly, and that it was understood between you that, though he did not accept at the time, he should have a right to do it if circumstances should require, and that he so represented it to the First Consul. I shall, in my next, be more particular, and tell you what I have finally concluded. Be persuaded that, whatever it is, it will be so calculated as not to commit you, and rather to sacrifice my own sentiments than appear to the public to differ from you. I shall, I fear, be forced to sign the guarantee, but, at the same time, I wish, and think but just, that H—— and B—— should know how little security they will find in it.

You do not tell me whether you have Mr. King's cypher; if you have, I shall be able to write to you with more freedom; and I shall hope to receive from you the fullest information of the general politics of the country you are in, which is always material, even though we have no special negotiation on foot, since circumstances may arise in which it may be turned to advantage.

Our Board are going on, but talk of giving no certificates till the treaty is ratified. Though this resolution is not in the spirit of the treaty, may be burdensome to the creditors, and a certain expense to our Government in the accumulation of interest, yet I content myself with giving them my opinion, leaving them to pursue their own judgment in the matters committed to them. I send you papers by this conveyance, and will continue to do so as opportunity offers.

I am, dear sir, &c.,

ROBERT R. LIVINGSTON.

[Extract.]

"You have been apprised that, after what had passed between Mr. Talleyrand and me, the treaty was opened to me by Mr. Marbois, with whom I had several conferences, previous to Mr. Monroe's taking any share in the business. In the course of these conferences, as the principal object was the reduction of the price they demanded, I proposed, if an advance of money would facilitate this object, to make it to the extent of our powers. Mr. Marbois desired me not to mention it; for, says he, if the treaty should not be ratified, I may be placed in difficulties relative to restoring the money, which will, in that case, be expended. When, after this, formal powers were given to Mr. Marbois, and Mr. Monroe assisted at our conferences, the offer was again repeated by us both, and again rejected upon the same ground. Mr. Marbois, indeed, proposed, when we had agreed to pay in stock, that the creditors should be paid in like manner with the French Government, part in stock and part in money. To this I objected, claiming the Consul's express promise that they should be promptly paid, insisting that justice and his honor required that they should be completely satisfied; and he readily acquiesced in the sentiment, and the rather as I showed him that, if the stock was vested in so many hands, the wants of the creditors would force it upon the market at a reduced price, to the injury of that France held, as well as to that of the United States. I saw not only this evil, but a greater, in the drain that France would make of our cash, if it was given to her, and the ruinous effect it would have upon the course of exchange, at the very moment that our Government were making remittances to pay the Dutch loan"

"The delicate situation in which I am placed with the French Government, and the evils that evidently result to our own, together with the distresses of individuals who hoped to be paid under the treaty, will not permit me to be longer silent on the subject of your determination not to execute the duties that are enjoined upon you by the convention under which you are appointed. Reasons of a very important political nature induced Mr. Monroe and myself to insert that article in the treaty which led to your nomination."

No. 496.

Mr. James Madison, Secretary of State of the United States, to Mr. Livingston.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, October 27, 1803.

SIR: One of the enclosed memorials, respecting claims which are made upon the French Government for bills drawn by its agents in St. Domingo, and which remain unpaid, having been presented to the Senate, its subscribers had leave to withdraw it, and with the other, which has never been preferred to Congress, has now been brought before the Executive with a view to a reference of the subject to your patronage. It would be superfluous to add anything to the reflections made by the memorialists themselves upon the injustice and inconvenience which must result to them from a perseverance on the part of the French Government in its rejection of the bills as evidence of the debt, and in the exaction of original proof of the contract and the delivery of the merchandise for which they were drawn. It is in particular justly observed that, in most instances, compliance with such a requisition by the parties is impracticable from the very nature of the transactions, and practicable only to the French Government whose officers have the custody of the papers containing the evidence it desires; nor can it be believed that the Government seriously intends to vacate the bills which, though tainted with fraud in the original parties, have been regularly and honestly negotiated between others; as such a procedure, besides departing from the established custom of mercantile transactions, would very much check the credit and circulation of any future similar bills which its exigencies might require to be issued.

How far it may be justifiable or expedient formally to press all these claims upon the French Government for immediate payment is a consideration to be distinguished from the clear opinion which is entertained of their intrinsic justice. Wherever they originated in compulsory measures practised upon the claimants they are entitled to the full and immediate interposition of their Government; but where the bills have been received by virtue of voluntary contracts, whether with the agent of the French Government or individuals, the receivers having regard, as they must have had, to the degree of credit and punctuality ascribable to that Government at the period of their speculation, any calculation and consequent disappointment ought not to be permitted to embarrass their own Government by binding it to pursue very pointed measures for their relief.

With this distinction, which will find its way into your representations in such shape as may not convey the inference that either class is absolutely abandoned, or even not deemed highly obligatory upon France, these claims are confided to your patronage in the hope that the French Government will readily see the subject in that point of view, which will constrain it, out of regard to its own honor and interest, to remove every impediment to their payment, according to the obligations imported by the bills themselves and the law merchant applicable to the suspension which has taken place.

The papers also enclosed herewith respecting the schooner Maria, owned by William Lewis, evince that he has sustained a considerable loss through the irregular conduct of the captain of a French national vessel. From the nature of the occurrence, and the contents of the accompanying letter to the Minister of Marine in relation to it, written, as represented by Mr. Lewis, by the Governor of Tobago, to further his claims for redress, it is probable that no great difficulty will be experienced in obtaining due indemnification.

With great respect and consideration, &c., &c.,

JAMES MADISON.

No. 497.

No. 88.—Mr. Livingston to Mr. Madison, Secretary of State of the United States, dated Paris, October 31, 1803.

SIR: The article of the convention that authorized the nomination of Commissioners to determine certain questions under it previous to the ratifications was founded upon reasons that appeared extremely important to Mr. Monroe and myself; among them were, 1st, the full execution of the promise that I had obtained from the First Consul of a prompt discharge of the debt, which could only be satisfied by immediate measures for carrying it into effect. 2. The right that this gives us to demand that the exchange of the ratifications should be made in the United States instead of in France, for which it afforded the best and strongest arguments. 3. The uncertainty of the treaties being acceptable to the President and Senate, and the possibility of its not being ratified, in which case we should, by the appointment of Commissioners and their proceeding to act, have still acquired a very important point, because, before the circumstance could be known, the Board might, without any extraordinary exertion, have had every account liquidated, and obtained thereon the recognition of the debt by the French Government; so that all the chicane of their officers would have been avoided, and we should have nothing to press in future but the mere question of payment. 4. The saving of a very considerable sum of interest; for, as we learned from the state published of our Treasury that you had a large sum at your disposition, the Secretary of the Treasury might have found it convenient to pay the bills as they were presented, without even waiting the ultimate term in which they would have become due. 5. The great advantage to the country of putting a proportion of their capital, as soon as possible, into the hands of our mercantile citizens, as we had strong reasons to apprehend the war which has since broken out. 6. The melancholy situation in which many of our fellow-citizens, who were creditors of this Government, were placed here called for immediate relief—they could not go away, and they were retained at great expense—a distant payment would have compelled them to make very heavy sacrifices for a present relief. Could the bills have been put into their hands, those bills would, the moment the news arrived of the ratification, have been money, and might, on the eve of a war, have been so vested as to have made up for all their losses.

We named gentlemen upon the spot, because, having put the burden of the business upon Mr. Skipwith's hands, and left them very little to do, we presumed that they could serve the public at small expense, as it would very little derange their private business, and they might manage to meet and adjourn at pretty long intervals.

I agreed to the appointment of Mr. McClure, upon his express promise not to be absent (he was then going to England) more than three weeks. The expectation of his return kept the other gentlemen, for some time, from proceeding, but his delay greatly exceeding their expectation they at length began to act, and actually sent up several accounts to the Council of State, who have passed them. On the arrival of Mr. McClure, about two months since, they have stopped all proceedings, except, as they say, they are collecting papers, (which is, in other words, doing nothing,) since all these papers are prepared and collected by the agent and their secretary, and very few are in any sort necessary. This conduct is ruinous to the creditors here, whose capitals have, in consequence of it, greatly sunk; and such are their necessities that they are compelled to dispose of it; commercial arrangements of creditors in the United States will be defeated. All the objects we had in view in the nomination of these gentlemen, prior to the ratification, are annulled. Suspicions are induced on this Government that we have some secret object in view, and I am daily questioned on this subject, since it appears very extraordinary that we should have pressed this measure, and made it the foundation of the ratification in America—the moment the business of the claims is put into our hands, that we should stop in its progress, and add to the calamities of the creditors of whose situation I had so often drawn a melancholy picture. The present delays will occasion very serious ones in passing the accounts through the French Boards, and shut my mouth when I complain of them; and a question, as has already been intimated to me, of some importance will arise, on which I pray you to give me your instruction, that I may be prepared when it shall happen. It is said that if the sum overruns the 20,000,000, the Government will consider itself in no way bound to make up the loss of interest occasioned by the act of our Board. If they refuse to add this to the certificate, under an apprehension that it may swell the debt, what am I to do? to let the whole business lay till I receive your order, or take the interest on ourselves? The loss of interest by the delay of the Board, by the consequent delay of the French Boards, and by the litigations it may give birth to, will not fall much short of a million of livres.

If the minister in France is, as these gentlemen contend, to have no control over the Board, neither to advise them nor to receive information from them, his situation with the Government will, in many cases, be extremely painful, and many inconveniences may arise both to our Government and its citizens.

I am fearful that our choice of Mr. McClure has been very unfortunate; his opinion controls the Board, and he has so entirely lost the confidence of the public creditors that I fear nothing he can do in future will be satisfactory to those that are here or in America.

Enclosed are the letters which have passed between us, upon which you will found the best estimate of the subject.

I have the honor to be, sir, with the highest respect and esteem, your most obedient, humble servant,

ROBT. R. LIVINGSTON.

No. 498.

Mr. Madison, Secretary of State of the United States, to the Minister of Foreign Affairs of the French Republic, dated Department of State, November 4, 1803.

SIR: I was honored in due time with your letter of the 12th Prairial, (June 2,) and have now the satisfaction to inform you that the treaty and conventions of April 30 last have obtained the regular approbation of the several branches of our Government.

The solid considerations which led to this result, the mutual confidence with which the negotiations were conducted, and the promptness of the executory measures on both sides, give a character to the transaction which promises great and lasting advantages to the two nations. This may be expected, with the greater reason, as the treaty now concluded pursues the original spirit of their political relations, which, in excluding as much as possible sources of jealousy and collusion, invited to a friendly cultivation of every common interest. I did not fail to make known to Mr. Gallatin the passage in your letter having reference to his department. His explanations to Mr. Marbois will have shown how much he is disposed to accommodate, as far as circumstances will permit, the execution of the pecuniary articles of the convention to the arrangements of the French Government.

You will learn from Mr. Pichon, as well as from Mr. Livingston, the manner in which Spain has endeavored to embarrass here the transfer of Louisiana to the United States. It is presumed that she will have interfered with a like view at Paris. The effect of a proceeding which is equally unfounded and unexpected will doubtless be no other than a feeble demonstration of the good faith and honor which guarantee the execution of the treaty in all its parts. Persuaded, sir, of your personal disposition to promote such measures on the part of your Government as will most efficaciously concur with those taken by ours for securing an object so interesting to both, I feel the greater pleasure in offering the assurances, which I pray you to accept, of the very distinguished consideration with which

I have the honor to be, &c.,

JAMES MADISON.

No. 499.

Sundry Merchants and Captains of vessels to Mr. Livingston, dated Paris, November 4, 1803.

To his excellency Robert R. Livingston, Minister Plenipotentiary from the United States of America to the French Republic:

The long series of public services which have marked and employed your excellency's life, the benefits arising to our country from the late treaty with France, and the eminent advantages which it insures to the creditors of the United States, we trust are sufficient titles upon which to claim your indulgence in the present address.

We, the undersigned, citizens of the United States and creditors of the French Republic, take the liberty to express our disappointment in not seeing carried into effect the convention entered into by your excellency and James Monroe, Esq., on the part of our Government, with the French Republic, by which our accounts were to be liquidated, and bills given us for the amount on the Treasury of the United States. The total ignorance we are under relative to this procrastination, except in a few instances, induces us to request such information from your excellency as you may think proper to communicate, to enable us to form some opinion as to the propriety of our further attendance here, or whether it may not be better to seek the means of returning to our country.

We cannot refrain from suggesting to your excellency that the delay has caused many of us to part with a portion of our claims at half their value, to raise money to defray our expenses and to fulfil our engagements; whereas, had the accounts been liquidated and bills drawn, we could have realized their full amount. The difference is an actual loss of so much property that would have gone to the United States had the execution of the commission progressed according to our expectations, and what was contemplated by the framers of the convention.

A consciousness of your excellency's desire to advance the interest of your country and countrymen has induced us to address you, relying that your excellency will make such communication to us on the subject as may be expedient and proper.

We have the honor to be, with great regard and respect, your excellency's most obedient and very humble servants,

Copy of a letter from Mr. Livingston, Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States to France, in answer to the foregoing, dated Paris, November 5, 1803.

GENTLEMEN: In answer to your polite address of this day, I can only say I have, from my first arrival in France, made every effort which circumstances would admit of to obtain full justice for such of my fellow-citizens as were creditors of France. Nor did I ever hesitate to make to those that applied to me for information the fullest communication, not considering this business as one which was in its nature secret, and deeming it of the utmost importance to the individual to know his true situation and his probable prospects. When, about two months before the conclusion of the treaty, my endeavors were so far crowned with success as to have the strongest hopes of effecting this desirable object, I did not wait for an application, but summoned the creditors together, and read them the letter of the minister, written by express order of the First Consul in answer to one addressed directly to him, by which he pledged himself that the debts should be promptly and fully paid. I then added my persuasion that this pledge should be carried into effect, as well because I had the utmost reliance upon his good faith, as because I hoped that his promise would form the basis of a treaty which would facilitate its execution. This treaty has been happily concluded; and I shall always do so much justice to the integrity of the First Consul as to believe that his desire to effectuate his promise was among the exciting causes to this important act.

I mention these circumstances, gentlemen, to show that nothing would induce me to withhold from you the fullest information on a subject in which you are so deeply interested, by the communication of my correspondence with the Commissioners, but an apprehension of affording some handle for malevolence to take hold of. I must confine myself, then, to tell you, gentlemen, in general terms, that the Commissioners have assured me, by letter, that they have always doubted their powers to act under the treaty till its ratification, and that this doubt, though it has not prevented them to take some steps which must facilitate the business, restrains them from the final adjustment of any account till that event is announced.

Accept, gentlemen, my sincere thanks for the polite manner in which you have noticed my services, and be assured that they will find their full reward in the satisfaction it affords to me to have been instrumental in procuring to you and other of my fellow-citizens, creditors of France, the justice they have so long sought, and which, I trust, they are upon the eve of obtaining.

I am, gentlemen, your most obedient, humble servant,

ROBT. R. LIVINGSTON.

Postscript of a letter from Mr. Madison, Secretary of State of the United States, to Mr. Livingston, dated November 9, 1803.

The President approves of the individuals appointed as Commissioners to liquidate the claims payable under the convention of the 30th of April last. But as it now appears that difficulties have arisen, and are likely to increase, respecting the true construction of that instrument, and especially as it seems more than possible that the twenty millions allotted for the payments to be made under it may be insufficient to cover all which in equity and by a sound interpretation ought to be included, it is the desire of the President that you apply to the French Government for its consent to suspend the issuing of any drafts upon the awards which may be given until it is ascertained whether the twenty millions be sufficient or not, and with a view to give time for such mutual explanations and arrangements as may tend to effectuate the true spirit and object of the convention. In taking this step you will refer yourself to the further communications you are to expect from your Government upon the subject, the application you may make upon it to that of France being intended only as a preliminary to a further development.

No. 501.

Mr. Livingston to the Minister of Exterior Relations of the French Republic, dated Paris, January 7, 1804.

SIR: Having seriously reflected upon your excellency's note of the 13th Nivose, I beg leave to submit to your consideration the result of those reflections. In this, I trust, you will find the strongest reasons to adhere strictly to the provisions of the convention, however it may occasion inconveniences to individuals.

You propose that where oppositions are interposed to the claims of American citizens under the convention, the existence of the opposition should be noted by the Bureau of Liquidation on the certificate, and that no payment should be made by the Government of the United States till this opposition is removed.

The first effect of such a measure would be to render a bureau established for the settlements of accounts a court of justice for the trial of titles. For either they must judge of the validity of the opposition, or the most trifling must be admitted—all being equal till tried.

The second effect would be the cruel hardships it would impose upon the creditors who have already been detained many years, at great expense, from their families and country in the pursuit of their claims. Numerous oppositions, well or ill founded, would be brought forward in the hope that the American creditor, worn out by expense and delay, would be ready to make a sacrifice of great proportion of his right, even to persons who were not entitled, with a view to facilitate his obtaining the remainder. The delay of payment, sir, has already occasioned very heavy sacrifices; let us not add to them by new regulations. Besides, sir, most of these claims are due to persons in America who have left no agent to settle their affairs, but merely to receive what may be due to them. These agents may be totally ignorant of claims that may be set up by French citizens against the absentee, and of course cannot contest them; so that the utmost injustice would be done if pretended oppositions were interposed, since they could not be taken off till the creditor brought his suit in the courts of the United States. What a door would not this open to fraudulent opposition?

A third difficulty would arise: many of these claims have been sold without any knowledge of claims against the holder. It would certainly be unjust to make the purchaser liable for the debt of the seller without notice of such debt, nor indeed would this be allowable in any court of law. Yet, doubtless, were we to enter into the regulation proposed, many oppositions would be entered on this ground, and the payment due to the assignee would be delayed.

Your propositions proceed upon the principle that credit has been given to the American or the French Government. This, I believe, sir, has very seldom happened, since the payment by France has always been considered as very remote; but when it has happened the French creditor has not failed to take an assignment or security upon the debt itself. In which case there will be no difficulty in granting him the certificates to the amount of his assignment. In every other case he will be in the same situation with other creditors. If his debtor is in France, he will have his remedy against him in the French courts of justice. If he is in America, the courts of law are open to him for the recovery of his debts. The American Government have always referred questions of law to the courts. They have granted large sums to French citizens on various occasions, and even under the convention of 1800, without ever suffering the money to be arrested by the American who might have a demand against the French citizen. They consider the business of the courts and the business of the bureaus as totally distinct; nor will they suffer one to interfere in the operations of the other. If another rule should be adopted here the conduct of the respective Governments would not be reciprocal.

To guard against these evils, sir, the convention has precisely marked out the rule for the bureaus, who are merely to settle the account without regard to the person who is to receive—and for the American minister, who is bound to give the bills to the party or to his assignee and to no other; so that, without a new convention, I consider myself as having no right to look beyond the persons who answer one or the other of those descriptions. I flatter myself that your excellency will consider these reflections as conclusive, and discourage any attempt to delay the execution of the convention by the interposition of any opposition.

Accept, sir, the assurances of my high consideration.

ROBT. R. LIVINGSTON.

No. 94.—Mr. Livingston to Mr. Madison, Secretary of State of the United States, dated Paris, January 1, 1804.

"The measures taken for carrying the treaty into effect are such as afford me the highest satisfaction, and I rejoice that the protests of the Spanish envoy has given good ground for taking the decisive measures, and explaining, by your act, the extent of your boundaries. The ratifications were received by the same conveyance. I enclose Mr. Talleyrand's note on the occasion. You will be astonished when I tell you that, upon asking the minister whether the Consul was pleased with the transaction and the manner of it, he told me that he was not, that Mr. Pichon should have annexed the resolution, &c., since the stock was not immediately created. I told him his idea was a very extraordinary one, when he knew that the laws were immediately to pass, and would have had a very ungracious appearance; that the President, instead of availing himself of the three months' delay, had resolved to create the stock as soon as he should hear of our possessing the country; that I thought the First Consul, instead of manifesting any displeasure, ought to be in the highest degree satisfied. He shrugged up his shoulders, and said he wanted the money, and had hoped there would have been no delay. He asked me when I thought the stock would come, and whether I could not contrive to turn it into money at an early day? I told him that I supposed that it might be expected by the end of January, and that I presumed he would find no difficulty in raising the money, since he had already turned it into bills, and anticipated a payment of 10,000,000 of those bills; that this was an affair to transact with the bankers. I mention these circumstances merely to show how rapid the wishes of the First Consul are, and how extremely difficult it is to count upon the natural course of things in transacting business with him.

"This, sir, greatly increases my anxiety at the postscript of your letter, in which you direct me to obtain permission to delay the issue of the bills till certain doubts are removed, and till it is ascertained what the amount of the claims will be, and till certain ulterior instructions arrive. It is impossible to see in what light he will consider this application; he will certainly view with astonishment the United States, who have hitherto pressed with such ardor the payment of the claims of their citizens, whose distress they have painted in such glowing colors, who have offered the most pointed complaints against the delays of the French Boards, now checking the progress of the business, and continuing the distress of their citizens. I sincerely wish, sir, that you had explained to me the doubts that have arisen under the treaty. I see none of any importance but which may easily be removed if the Commissioners (or rather Mr. McClure, for he governs the Board) shall entertain a sincere desire to accomplish their task. Nor do I see any reason to believe that the twenty millions will not cover all the just demands within the treaty; for, though the nominal sum is much higher, yet we know of a certainty that many claims have actually been discharged; that some are charged twice even in the provisional note; that many are in paper, and will be reduced to one-tenth of their apparent sum. Upon the whole, the provisional note cannot amount, inclusive of the interest, to ten millions; so that I have well founded reasons to believe that there will be no excess of debts beyond it which are not provided for. One million, at least, of interest will be added by the delay I am directed to obtain, and by the measures the Board have pursued; but that million is a charge against the United States, since it is solely occasioned by their act. The distress that the claimants here will feel by this delay, the derangements that it will make in mercantile speculations, will cause a very heavy loss to many. But, sir, how is this instruction to operate? The convention is now the law of the Board. What power exists to arrest its operation in any way but by enacting a new law, that is, by framing a new treaty? This, then, must go though all the forms; it must be sent back for ratification. How many months must elapse before this can be effected, since I have not yet received the instructions for its commencement? In the meantime, sir, in what a delicate situation am I placed! Suppose the acts are passed, the necessary certificates given, and the party applies to me for the bills—what answer am I to give? Will it be sufficient for me to plead an instruction for a breach of the law? Would it not have been infinitely better to have suffered the business to go on, and, if there had been an excess, for our Government to have paid it, and constituted themselves creditors of the French Government to that amount? The embarrassments to what this and other acts arising from different views of the subject, (among which may be counted the affair of the guaranty,) obliges me to act so inconsistently with myself, and to undo one day what I had done the day before, as to render my situation very irksome.

"If the Government sees through other eyes than those of its minister—if it founds its measures upon informations received through other channels, and some of those avowedly unfriendly to him—he is bound in honor to quit his station.

"The law, too, directing me to draw bills is such as is certainly not calculated to render me very easy. I am to be constituted debtor for millions, in an affair in which I have no personal interest, till I satisfy the accounting officers of the Treasury that I have drawn conformably to the convention. Thus my character, my fortune, are to be at the discretion of the accounting officers without any rule being prescribed to me, or to them, by which I am to obtain my acquittance. I should have expected, sir, that the proof should have been described in the law, so that, if it accompanied the bill, I should have been acquitted, and the books of the Treasury been at all times balanced. I am not to judge of the convention. The Commissioners tell me I have nothing to do with them. My bills can only be founded upon their certificate, and when this is produced it should serve as my discharge. It is upon this condition only that I will draw. It is probable that your instructions will prevent any bills from being drawn till after the time I have set for my resignation. Should it happen otherwise, I shall draw a special bill, referring to the draft of the Board, which I shall annex to the bill, and I shall expect that the accounting officers, when they receive the bill, shall, at the same time, balance my account; for I will, in no event, stand on the books of the Treasury for unaccounted balances—no! not for a single moment. It is true that this mode of drawing will lessen the value of the bill to the holder who is compelled to part with it, because its payment will depend upon the contingency of the Treasury, considering the condition I annexed to the bill as good or bad. But it is the only way in which I will draw, until you are pleased, with the concurrence of the Secretary of the Treasury, to prescribe to me some such precise rule as will answer the object I have in view, which is, never to appear a public defaulter, or to commit my fortune, or that of my family, to such uncertain hazard as the opinion of the accounting officers in a country rent as ours by party. The Government have a right to command my time and my services, but they have no right to exact from me the sacrifice, or even the most distant hazard, of my fortune, beyond what I may voluntarily sacrifice to the support of my station. I shall send herewith an estimate, made upon the best grounds I can collect, of the amount of the debts when reduced to their true principles, and by this I think there is good reason to hope that all to which the convention refers, to wit: all debts incurred before the convention of 1800 will be paid without exceeding the twenty millions; or, if there is any excess, it will be so small that it will be better for our Government to discharge them than to stop the progress of the Board, and incur a heavy loss in expenses and interest. But, as your order leaves nothing to my discretion, I shall obey your commands and make the application you require, though my heart bleeds for the distress that it will occasion to many here, and the door that will be opened for speculating upon their losses."

No. 503.

Mr. Livingston to Mr. Madison, dated Paris, January 13, 1804.

"The measures of the Commissioners exciting the utmost uneasiness and dissatisfaction among the creditors here, and as I doubt not that it will be extended to those of the United States, and afford ground for improper speculations upon their debts, I have been anxious to afford you a just view of the probable amount of the demand. In this I had hoped to have been aided by Mr. Skipwith, whose duty it certainly was to give me the most accurate information he could collect. I have received from him a list of claims, and I had hoped, as he gave me reason to believe, that he would annex such observations to it as would have served to direct my judgment; this, however, he has since declined, and he tells me that he has transmitted this list to you; the impropriety of his corresponding directly with you on public measures, without submitting his correspondence to my inspection, is so obvious that I trust it will receive your marked disapprobation. In the present instance, unless he has accompanied his list with very particular observations, it must lead you into error and deceive the American creditors greatly, as to his probable prospect of payment, since the whole list is a tissue of errors, and is calculated to render the amount of claims as large as possible, with what view I will not pretend to judge. The list contains a number of claims for which there is no foundation; a number that are paid, as Mr. Skipwith himself knows; a number for which no vouchers can be produced; a number that do not come under the treaty. I have endeavored to investigate the subject as well as I can do in the little time that has been left me, since I have lost the hope of Mr. Skipwith's aid in doing it, the result of which you will find in the enclosed statement. I send you the several notes on which the calculations are made, except one, No. 000; this I omit, because the particulars of this might bear the appearance of prejudging particular cases, though I have no doubt that the result will be what I have stated.

"Upon the whole, I have very little doubt that the twenty millions will cover the whole of the claims embraced by the convention, particularly if, as is manifestly just, the United States pay the interest, which will not amount to less than a million, incurred by the conduct and delays of their own officers. The Chef de Bureau, Mr. Guillaume, asserts that eighteen millions will more than cover all our demands. It is of the utmost importance that our Government should be well informed on this interesting subject, and that false views of it should not lead to delays and to such discouragements as may render our citizens the prey of speculators. It is much to be lamented that Mr. McClure has contrived to influence the mind of one of the Board, and to prevent that harmony between them and me which the public interest requires, and which we happily enjoyed till he came from England and joined the Board.

"Barnet has disapproved of all their transactions, but is weak and timid; when he cannot get them to take his advice he joins in their measures, and then acknowledges to me that they are wrong, and apologizes for them by saying that he cannot oppose his colleagues.

"When they were notified of the ratification of the treaty, they gave out that they would go on. But as far as I can learn, they are now doing nothing. It is certain they have sent up no accounts since the arrival of Mr. McClure. It is my duty to say that the public interest requires his immediate removal, as well as direct instructions to the Board to advise with the minister, and inform him of all the transactions, and that the same order should go to the Commercial Agent, whose business, in fact, at Paris, is, and ought to be, that only of a Commercial Secretary. I have no personal interest in urging this, since, I trust, that your first letters, after the receipt of this, will bring my permission to retire, but the public interest imperiously demands it. I have not thought it proper to apply to the French Government for permission to suspend the drawing of the bills, for, since the Board have stopped their proceedings, it will be unnecessary. I think it more prudent to leave the responsibility, since they chose to take it, with them, and lay it to our Government. Besides, as the French Government knows they are doing nothing, they will think the demand premature. This delay will also, as I trust, afford me a more ample detail of your reasons than I have yet received, and entitle me to combat the objections which, I doubt not, will be made here to the creation of new delays, since they are far from being pleased with those that have already intervened."

No. 504.

Mr. Livingston to Mr. Madison, dated Paris, January 18, 1804.

[Extract.]

"Nothing new has occurred since my last. I was mistaken when I said the Board were going on; they have, indeed, sent up six cases as "susceptible of liquidation," which is certainly the last business they have to do, and, as far as I see, except where doubts are raised, is totally unnecessary. The French Board have passed upon near half the causes, which ours might go through in ten days. But they touch none of them, and consume time and money in the copying, what I conceive to be, useless papers.

"Unless some direction is given with respect to them I have no doubt they will ultimately involve us with this Government, as they have already done with the creditors."

No. 505.

Mr. Madison to Mr. Livingston, dated January 31, 1804.

"In my letter of the 9th of November last I communicated the ideas entertained by the President with respect to the pecuniary provision in the last convention with France in behalf of our citizens. It is presumed that you will have found no difficulty in obtaining the concurrence of the French Government in suspending drafts in favor of any until the claims of all shall have been ascertained. Should the sum of $3,750,000 be insufficient for the payment of all, as becomes daily more probable, the least that ought to be attempted will be an apportionment of it among them. Perhaps more than this may now be attended with great difficulty, although it is clear that the patronage of the Government of the United States is due on prior considerations to some classes of the claimants than to others; to those, for example, whose property was wrongfully taken on the high seas by force, than to those who, by voluntary contracts, placed a confidence in the French Government, which was disappointed. It seems requisite, nevertheless, that some effort should be made in behalf of those whose claims were embraced by the convention of September 30, 1800, and not provided for by that of April 30, 1803.

"With this view the President thinks it proper that you should adjust with the French Government a provision for comprehending in the convention of 1803 the claims still remaining under the convention of 1800, and for apportioning the money payable at the Treasury of the United States among the claimants under both; or, as the object next to be pursued, a provision for apportioning among the whole the money so payable, and also the balance chargeable on France, according to the tenor of the last convention; or, as the object next in order, a provision for apportioning among the whole the money payable at the Treasury of the United States, leaving to the claimants under the last convention the balance from France to which it entitles them; or, lastly, a provision for apportioning among the claimants under the last convention the money so payable, instead of paying it in the order of settlement, or according to any other rule of preference.

"The first arrangement takes for granted that France considers herself bound, notwithstanding the last convention, to satisfy all the claims provided for by the first convention pretermitted by the last. The supposition is founded on several expressions and implications of its text, as the head of the fifth article, 'all agreements,' &c., and particularly in the closing words of Art. X, and with respect to debts, the provision is express in Art. XII. This construction is the more reasonable also, inasmuch as the reciprocal stipulations of the convention of 1800 in this particular were carried into immediate and full effect on the part of the United States; and as a contrary construction would imply the relinquishment, without equivalent, of vested rights never formally contested by France.

"Should France, however, be unlikely to admit her responsibility for the pretermitted claims, and there be danger that, by urging her responsibility at this time, an equitable modification of any sort may be rendered more difficult, it will be best to pass over the question for the present, taking care that no waiver be made which may either still further weaken the claims against France, or give color for turning them over against the United States.

"Neither of the succeeding alternatives will increase the balance payable by France, nor is it contemplated that in these or any other modifications whatever the Treasury of the United States is to be made chargeable with more than $3,750,000, or rather with more than so much of that sum as would satisfy the debts to which it is subjected by the last convention.

"The object of each of the proposed modifications is to distribute whatever is to be paid by the United States and by France among all the claimants, as well those omitted as those included in the last convention; and in such a manner that every claimant of both descriptions shall receive a fair proportion from the Treasury of the United States, as well of the balance to be paid by France.

"The claimants who were provided for in the last convention cannot justly complain of any arrangement that will replace on the same footing with themselves their fellow claimants left by the last, under the first convention, as being a retrospective measure working a disadvantage to them. The retrospective proceeding will be found to lie in the last convention, so far as it is disadvantageous in its operation, to those claiming under the first only. An act superseding a retrospective act is not itself retrospective. The effect of it is to restore and enforce the original rule of justice.

"Should the French Government refuse to concur in any proposition that will restore the latitude given to claims as defined by the first convention, and which is narrowed and obscured by the text of the last, it will be proper to settle with the Government, if it can be done, such a construction of this text as will be most favorable to all just claims, particularly those for freights, indemnities, property put in requisition, and the separate property of individuals who are concerned in the disqualifying partnerships mentioned in the convention, which are said to be threatened with rejection by the Board at Paris. It is to be kept in view, however, that "in case the whole sum of $3,750,000 should not be absorbed by the construction of the Board, the construction settled with the French Government is not to enlarge the sum to be paid by the Treasury of the United States beyond that to which the Treasury would be made liable by the construction of the Board.

"It will occur to you that, in case the field of claims should be enlarged, the time for presenting and settling them ought to be lengthened. You can yourself best decide how far a prolongation of the time necessary for the claims now admissible before the Board may be necessary, and ought to be attempted.

"There is reason to believe that not a few of this description are yet to be forwarded from this side the Atlantic."

"The convention with Spain, which was not agreed to at the last session of Congress, has been resumed and ratified during the present. The objection to it was, that it did not provide, in sufficient extent, for repairing the injuries done to our commerce; particularly in omitting the case of captures and condemnations by French cruisers and Consuls within Spanish responsibility. As the convention does not abandon the omitted cases, but merely leaves them for further negotiation, it was judged best, on the whole, not longer to deprive that class of our citizens who are comprehended in the convention of the benefit of its provisions. The claims of the others will be pursued with due attention, and may, perhaps, be advantageously brought into the negotiation, with which Mr. Monroe and Mr. Pinckney will be jointly charged."

No. 506.

Mr. Madison to Mr. Charles Pinckney, Minister to Spain, dated February 6, 1804.

[Extract.]

"Your last letter, not already acknowledged, is that of August 2, continued on August 30.

"The Senate having resumed at the present session the convention with Spain, postponed at the last, have thought proper to ratify it; and the President has completed the act on the part of the United States.

"The instrument is now returned to you with these sanctions, in order to be exchanged for the ratification of his Catholic Majesty. You will hasten this formality as much as possible, and forward the result to the Government here, that no time may be lost in procuring to our citizens the benefit stipulated to them. To favor despatch, as well as to guard against casualties, duplicates and even triplicates will be proper.

"In concurring in this partial provision for the indemnities due from Spain, it is to be particularly understood that it proceeds from no other considerations than a wish to shorten the delay of relief to that portion of the claimants who are included in the provision, and a determination to avail the residue of the reserve, expressly made in behalf of their claims by the — article of the convention. When the decision of the Senate was postponed at the last session, it was justly hoped that, before the succeeding one, the Spanish Government would have yielded to the reasonableness and justice of giving to the provision the extent required by the United States; in which case the arrangements would have been simplified, and a foundation laid at once for closing all controversies on the subject. The final refusal of Spain to concur in these views has been thought to give a preference to the course now adopted.

"None of the pleas urged by the Spanish Government can in the least invalidate the justice of the claims for injuries committed by French citizens or agents within her jurisdiction.

"If his Catholic Majesty be sovereign in his own dominions, aliens within them are answerable to him for their conduct, and he, of course, is answerable for it to others. This is a principle founded too evidently in reason and usage to be controverted. As well might Spain say that a theft or robbery, committed in the streets of Madrid by a Frenchman on an American, is to be redressed by France, and not by her, as pretend that redress is to be sought for spoliations committed by cruisers from, or condemnations within Spanish ports. Nor is there any room for the distinction between the injuries proceeding from the French cruisers and the French Consuls. With respect to the Consuls, their acts were either authorized or not authorized by Spain; if authorized by Spain, Spain is answerable for giving them the authority; if not authorized by Spain, they could not be authorized at all; the law of nations giving them no such authority, and France having no right to give it; and being acts without authority, they are not to be regarded as consular acts, but as much the acts of private individuals as the cruisers, or any other irregularities committed or instituted by French citizens within the jurisdiction of Spain. To say that the Consuls derive their authority from the sanction given by Spain to the authority derived from France, without which sanction, positive or permissive, it is clear that the authority of France within the jurisdiction of Spain would be a nullity, is still to rest the condemnations by the Consuls on authority of Spain and to leave her responsible for them.

"Under every aspect, therefore, Spain is bound to do justice in this case to the citizens of the United States, unless she not only pleads a duress, suspending her free agency, and prostrating her national honor, but proves the reality of this duress; and not only proves this duress, but proves, moreover, first, that she did everything in her power to prevent the evil; next, that she did everything in her power to obtain reparation for it; and lastly, that in tolerating the evil she did not deliberately and wilfully surrender the neutral rights under her protection, to advantages, positive or negative, obtained or expected by herself from France.

"The suggestion that France was resorted to for redress is unfounded. It does not appear that any such resort was authorized by the Government of the United States; whilst the claims against Spain have been uniform and pressing. Nor is it believed that any interpositions have proceeded from the American legation at Paris. Had, indeed, such interpositions taken place they would in no respect lessen the obligations of Spain.

"Individuals may have made their applications to the French Government, but it will not be pretended that the merits of the question can be affected by that circumstance.

"The plea on which it seems that the Spanish Government now principally relies is the erasure of the second article from our late convention with France, by which France was released from the indemnities due for spoliations committed under her immediate responsibility to the United States. This plea did not appear in the early objections of Spain to our claims. It was an after thought, resulting from the insufficiency of every other plea, and is certainly as little valid as any other. The injuries for which indemnities are claimed from Spain, though committed by Frenchmen, took place under Spanish authority; Spain therefore is answerable for them. To her we have looked and continue to look for redress. If the injuries done to us by her resulted in any manner from injuries done to her by France, she may, if she pleases, resort to France as we resort to her. But whether her resort to France would be just or unjust is a question between her and France; not between either her and us, or us and France. We claim against her, not against France. In releasing France, therefore, we have not released her. The claims, again, from which France was released were admitted by France, and the release was for a valuable consideration in a correspondent release of the United States from certain claims on them. The claims we make on Spain were never admitted by France, nor made on France by the United States; they made therefore no part of the bargain with her, and could not be included in the release."

[Extract.]

"You say that the convention, if truly executed, would work the greatest injustice, and that you have mentioned your doubts to me; I confess, sir, I see none of these doubts or difficulties in the convention, which was clearly designed to embrace all debts due under the convention of 1800, and which does fully embrace all such, in the opinion of every man of common sense with whom I have conversed, yourself, and as I am told (though I know nothing of my own knowledge) the Commissioners, excepted. The only doubt you ever mentioned to me was, whether freight was included in the word fourniture; upon this, I confess, I never could see the smallest doubt, and so I have told you; fourniture is defined the act of providing, as also provision or supply, and in a peculiar manner embraces freight, either separately or as a part of the price of every foreign article, into which it must necessarily enter.

"I learn that the ingenuity of the Board has struck out a great variety of other difficulties which distress the claimants and the plain provisions of the treaty, but what they are I know not."

No. 508.

No. 1, F.—Mr. Livingston to the French Minister of Exterior Relations, dated Paris, February 24, 1804.

SIR: Doubts have arisen on the construction of one of the conventions, of 30th April last, between the United States and the French Republic, which relates to the debt to be discharged by the United States for account of the French Republic. I am anxious to know the opinion of the French Government on those articles on which such doubts have been raised, and the rather, as I am persuaded that a sense of justice, equally operating on France and the United States, will induce them to give it the most liberal construction.

The preamble of the convention expressly asserts that its object was to secure the payment of the sums due to the citizens of the United States, in compliance with the 2d and 5th articles of the convention of 8th Vindemiaire, an 9.

The 1st article is general, and refers to all such debts, but declares that they shall be paid according to subsequent regulations thereafter mentioned.

While the negotiations were pending, in order to form some general estimate of the amount and nature of the debt, the Minister of the Treasury, charged with the negotiation on the part of the First Consul, received from the Board of Comptability an account apperçu of the debts then before them; it was declared at the time by the accounting officer to be inaccurate, and was so understood by the plenipotentiaries on both sides, and it was even agreed that this should be endorsed on the note, but was, in the hurry of business, neglected, and for that reason has not been annexed to the convention itself.

It has been the constant intention of both contracting parties that debts equally just with those on the list should be equally paid, and not that they should be paid if unjust. It now appears that what was suspected is here. That many of the debts on the list have been paid, that others are not due, many greatly overcharged, and many charged twice under different heads; so that, upon a fair statement, there is the highest reason to believe that the whole of that note, including the embargo, together with the interest on the debt, will not exceed twelve millions of francs. The American Commissioners, I am informed, do not seem disposed to examine or order payment of any account that is not contained in that inaccurate list. I wish to know from your excellency whether the French Government acquiesces in this construction.

The second question arises upon the 4th article: It is insisted that the word fournitures does not include anything but provisions and goods, but neither supplies of money nor the freight of shipping to transport the articles furnished, nor charges which have accrued upon such ships, though admitted and recognized as just by the French Board.

I am so well satisfied that it is not the wish of the Government of the United States to make any advantage out of this circumstance, that I do not hesitate to declare that it was the intention of the American plenipotentiaries to render the treaty as extensive as the preamble indicates, and to include all debts provided for by the convention of 1800, as far as the twenty millions would go, with some checks to prevent frauds by persons not truly American citizens, or the covering of foreign property under American names. That in translating the word fournitures by the word supply, they have fully expressed this intention, which still appears to me, upon consulting the best French authors, to be co-extensive with this idea, since it is anything that can be furnished.

Were it even equivocal, the express intention of the treaty, as collected from the preamble, should, I believe, according to the established rules for the construction of treaties, govern its sense.

Another question arises upon the tenth article: It remains to know whether the decisions of the American Board of Commissioners, when they reject a claim, is final, or whether they must, in every such case, refer their decisions, with the reasons on which they have founded them, to the minister of the United States, so that the ultimate determination may rest with the French Government.

Upon these questions I pray your excellency to afford me an early answer, in such form as will serve as a direction to the American Commissioners and to the French Boards, to the end that those who are excluded from the benefit of the convention of April last may make their application to the Government of France to provide some other means for the discharge of debts which they have acknowledged to be justly due.

It may be satisfactory to your excellency to know that, upon the best estimate I have been able to make, I have reason to conclude that the twenty millions will suffice for payment of the whole debt that can be justly claimed under the last convention, even in giving it the most liberal construction.

These different questions might have been properly examined by the Minister of the Public Treasury and me previous to any application to your excellency; but I thought best to refer them immediately to you, and if you find it proper to communicate them to Mr. Marbois, I am inclined to think there will be little difficulty in agreeing to an explanation conformable to the intentions of both our Governments.

Accept, sir, the assurances of my high consideration.

ROBERT R. LIVINGSTON.

No. 509.

Mr. Skipwith, Commercial Agent of the United States at Paris, to Mr. Livingston, dated Paris, February 25, 1804.

[Extract.]

"I have the honor of agreeing entirely with you, that treaties are the acts of Government, who may have their own views in the manner of explaining them, and that these views they communicate only to their minister," &c., &c. "But in regard to the convention, sir, I am confident that neither the French nor American Government have any hidden view; they can only wish equal justice to be done American claimants; and I wish that I may not always have the honor of disgreeing with you on the subject of my proceedings, as agent under the convention, as agent of our Government, charged in a special manner with interests of individuals in prize causes; or as the agent of a great portion of the numerous just claimants in the United States, who had a right to expect that we were both equally attentive to their true interests here. I wish, sir, you would give yourself the trouble of looking back to my letter to you of the 5th of April last, with my statement at the same time of the claims then within my knowledge here, and ask yourself for the solution, whether those things have not passed unnoticed, while a conjectural note, rendered by a subordinate bureau of this Government, without even a signature being attached to it, is not exclusively consecrated by the 2d article of the convention. You will never make me believe, sir, though I myself have heard you more than once say so, that Mr. Marbois was determined to have that note exclusively recognized. I think you must have said, or thought so, from some wrong inference of his or this Government's determination on that head; at least, no impartial aud discerning man will be persuaded that either he or them would have consented to it, had you presented or urged any other view of American claims."

"The men of common sense, with whom I may converse, I dare say, must be very few indeed, sir, to the circle of yours. It is with the little stock I have of my own I see directly the reverse of what you so positively assert, 'that, in the opinion of all men, myself, (and as you are told,) the Commissioners excepted, the late convention embrace all debts due under the convention of 1800.' The last convention, if I am not strangely deceived, is a convention of exceptions to the one of 1800. Deign, I beg you, sir, to look for a moment at the instrument itself. Does not the very first article of it prove that the convention of 1800, as it regards the debts, is to be executed according to the regulations which the late convention is found to contain.

"Among these we find, in the language of the convention, 'that no debts are to be comprehended but such as are due for supplies, embargoes, and prizes made at sea.' It is further declared in the 5th article, 'that the captures to be paid for are those of which the Council of Prizes have ordered restitution,' that the debts to be paid must be such 'as are entitled to the protection of the United States,' that the citizens claiming, 'must not have established houses of commerce in foreign countries, in partnership with foreigners,' and must not, 'by the nature of their commerce, be regarded as domiciliated abroad.' There are provisions found in the late convention, without going into a more minute analysis of it, alone sufficient to prove the fallacy of that part of your letter upon which I am at present remarking.

"In respect to freight, I do recollect asking you the question you state, and though I am not civilian enlightened enough to say how your solution of it, as relating to supplies, would be received in the application of the law, yet I confess I am pleased with it, and as far as that construction may be connected with my agency under the convention it was always and is my intention to support it in cases where freight, from the nature of their flag, &c., &c., are entitled to that support; whether the Board, as you intimate is the fact, have struck out that and a great variety of other difficulties, I know not; their proceedings remain to be judged by our Government; their conduct, as well as mine, by an impartial public; as men of high patriotism, pure views, and sound judgments, I esteem them."

No. 510.

Mons. Barbé Marbois, Minister of the Public Treasury, to the Minister of Exterior Relations of the French Republic, dated Paris, March 8, 1804.

[Translation.]

I received, Citizen Minister, the letter you did me the honor to write to me on the 16th of this month. I transmit to you the information you ask.

That one of the two conventions of the 10th Floreal, year 11, which is relative to the claims of Americans on the Republic, stipulates that it shall be discharged by the United States in deduction of what we owe them; the principal object of this convention was to give satisfaction to the citizens of the United States and to the American Government, by procuring the execution of the treaty of the 8th Vindemiaire, year 9. The stipulations of it had remained until then without being executed, and gave rise to pressing solicitations from Mr. Livingston. These solicitations had acquired additional weight by the assurances which the First Consul had charged you to transmit to this minister some time before the signing of the convention of the 8th Floreal, year 11. Under this view, we had no other interest than that of extinguishing to the amount of twenty millions of debts, and to do it in perfect harmony with the American legation, and in such way that the Government of the United States might see that the distribution of the sum and the order between the creditors were equitable, and could not give room to any grounded complaint.

But the debt not being authentically acknowledged, the matter of the treaty about to be concluded being still an uncertain claim, it was necessary to determine to whom should accrue a possible profit on the debt, in case it should not amount to twenty millions. This determination presented two difficulties equally to be feared: one was that, if the overplus was to revert to us, the creditors, or those who pretended to be such, would complain on account of the rejection of their pretensions, and suppose that the interest we had to diminish the mass of the debt made us difficult about the admission of the vouchers; it is to do away this supposition that it was expressly agreed that if this sum of debts did not amount to twenty millions the overplus should not be claimed by France.

I subjoin to this an extract of the papers which contain this precise disposition; it is the more liberal on our part, as we could have made use of good reasons in favor of a contrary disposition. The other difficulty arose out of the presumption that, if the overplus were to go to the benefit of the United States, such a stipulation might dispose the American Commissioners to reject, without sufficient cause, many of the claims, in order to reduce insomuch the sums to be paid by their Republic. It is to provide against this as much as possible that we agreed to consider a statement produced by the liquidation as an approximation of the American claims; but we were, at the same time, very far from considering all the articles comprised in this statement as acknowledged to be liquidated and sheltered from all revisal. Mr. Livingston and I agree on this head; we thought, at the same time, that articles not comprised in this note, (apperçu,) might be paid in virtue of the convention, and it is equally contrary to the spirit of this article, and to reason, and to the principles which guided us during all the negotiation, to suppose that legitimate debts would be discharged for the single reason of their not making a part of this note. The minister of the United States and myself think alike on this subject.

This declaration answers to the first inquiry made by Mr. Livingston. I had foreseen that, sooner or later, these difficulties would be raised, and it is on this occasion that I had the honor to write you on the 18th Floreal, year 11, (May 8, 1803.)

The second inquiry concerns the sense of the 4th article. In order to reply to it I must observe that the American ministers stipulated for the creditors, their fellow-citizens.

The article is conformable to the note which they themselves had furnished me, and they had used in them the word supplies, which we translate by "fournitures." I do not hesitate in adopting the meaning which Mr. Livingston applies to this one, at the same time that it is liberal, so is it just; for it cannot be supposed that the negotiators wished to give a preference to one kind of claims, to the prejudice of money lent, or of debts due for freight; in fine, this meaning is grammatical; for money and all kinds of means of service are furnished, and this also embraces freight.

The American minister alone would have an interest in contesting this meaning. He could only do it by subtilties tended to weaken the debt, and a like intention was never manifested in the course of our negotiation.

The third question arises upon the sense of the 10th article. It appears to me resolved by the article itself. The results of the Board of American Commissaries cannot be definitive, and the whole article establishes clearly that they can only give opinions upon which Mr. Livingston and I will confer, and in case of disagreement the French Government will decide.

I know that there is a difference of opinion on these matters between Mr. Livingston and the American Commissioners. I hope, in all cases, that they will all be convinced that our only object is to do justice to all those who have a right to the twenty millions stipulated.

I have, &c.,

BARBE MARBOIS.

P. S. On reading over again your letter, Citizen Minister, I feel it my duty to express myself still more particularly on Mr. Livingston's third question; I think that, in order to prevent any delay in the delivery of the titles of payment of the debts acknowledged, it is important to define with precision the functions and authority of the Commissioners. You cannot, nor can I, have any direct relations with any other than the minister of the United States. It is, therefore, to him that they ought to transmit their provisional opinions and decisions, whether favorable or unfavorable to the claimants. I believe, also, that their functions ought to be confined to pronouncing on the following points:

"Is the claimant an American?"

"Is the claim (for American property) comprised in the treaty of the 8th Vindemiaire, year 9?"

No. 511.

Messrs. Mercer, Barnet, and Maclure, United States Commissioners of Claims, to Mr. Livingston, dated Paris, March 9, 1804.

SIR: We think it our duty to make to you the following representation: The records of our proceedings show that on this day there have been certified, under the direction of the convention, forty-six claims to be liquidated by the proper department of the French Government; and we have also certified forty others as not being embraced by its principles. No returns of any liquidation having been made in the first description, nor any objection offered to the latter, before the agent appointed under the 10th article of the convention, we submit to your judgment the propriety of urging the returns upon which our final certificates are to be granted.

Two reasons, arising from the convention, serve to point out the necessity of some step being taken to hasten this part of the business. The sum beyond which we can direct no liquidation to be made being limited, it becomes proper for us to know the amount of each liquidation. The time also being fixed within which "every necessary decision" is to be made is an additional cause for our calling your attention to this subject.

The claims founded upon the "conjectural note," as far as the state of the papers will permit us to decide, have received our opinion, those belonging to embargoes excepted. These papers, though expected in a few days, are not in such forwardness in the French office as to allow the agent of the United States to lay them before us.

We have the honor, &c.,

JOHN MERCER.

Mr. Livingston to Messrs. Mercer, Barnet, and Maclure, United States Commissioners of Claims, dated Paris, March 13, 1804.

GENTLEMEN: I have before me your letter of the 9th instant. The total ignorance in which you have thought it proper to keep me of all your proceedings has rendered it impossible for me, hitherto, to make any arrangements with the French Government for the final discharge of the debt due to our fellow-citizens, either out of the 20 millions to be paid by our Government or by the French Government, in case any debts due to them should not be comprised in the treaty. And now you have thought it proper to write to me, your letter leaves me totally in the dark as to the nature of your proceedings, and, of course, puts it out of my power to apply for what you call the returns, since, not knowing what your certificate is, I cannot possibly know whether any other is necessary than that already given. You speak in your letter of forty claims which you have certified as not being embraced by the convention. It appears to me that, in every such case, you should furnish me (and common justice would also require the parties) with the causes of your rejection, so that they might be specifically examined by the Minister of the Treasury, and ultimately by the French Government; for it cannot be supposed that it could be the intention of France, in the convention, to put 20 millions at the disposition of the United States, to pay the debts due from the former, and then leave it to agents, appointed by the latter, to determine how far they would or would not apply this sum to that object. The whole power of the Board only goes to an examination, and not to a final conclusion on any point whatever, except as to the two points contained in the certificate they are to give, to wit: That the debt is due to an American citizen; and that it existed before 30th September, 1800; and, at all events, the reasons of your rejection should be explained, that if valid the creditor might recur to France for payment. Having heard, though not from you, gentlemen, that you had doubts upon many parts of the convention, I thought it advisable to see how far the French ministers concurred with me in the construction of it. I do myself the honor to enclose my letter, together with Mr. Marbois' answer, in which the Minister of Exterior Relations fully concurs. I do not know how far you will consider this as a direction to you in your proceedings, but I shall conceive that I have done my duty in submitting it to your consideration; and I only regret that you have not long since sought instructions on doubtful points, which I shall always think, and I trust our Government will think, the most proper course.

You mention, as a reason for my pressing a final decision of the French Government, that there is a certain sum beyond which you can direct no liquidation. I confess I see no such direction to you in the convention; on the contrary, I think you are bound to liquidate the whole debt; because what is not payable by our Government must be discharged by France.

I have the honor to be, gentlemen, yours, &c.,

Mr. Livingston to Mr. Skipwith, dated Paris, March 13, 1804.

SIR: I have this moment received your letter, with your correspondence with Mr. Defermon. I can only say that I agree with him exactly in sentiment, and that this is also the sentiment of the French Government, as appears by a letter from Mr. Marbois to the Minister of Foreign Relations, which I have enclosed to the Commissioners for American Claims, and which they will doubtless communicate to you. I take this opportunity to inform you, in answer to two passages in your former letter that appeared to be erroneous: 1st, that upon a full investigation of your state of the claims I find it much more erroneous than that of Mr. Guillaume, of which you will be convinced, by its falling very considerably short in the general amount; of course great injustice would have been done by giving it a preference as you appear to wish; 2d, that I have preferred no complaint against the Board of Commissioners (as you assert) to the French Government; though Mr. Marbois communicated to me a petition (containing some statements of complaints) by those whose claims were rejected, in which they desired the French Government to provide means for the discharge of their demands if they were precluded from the benefit of the convention. This was shown me by Mr. Marbois, in consequence of the petition being sent in while I was in his cabinet on other business.

I am, &c.,

Messrs. Mercer, Barnet, and Maclure, United States Commissioners of Claims, to Mr. Livingston, dated Paris, March 22. 1804.

[Extract.]

"In your letter to the Minister of Exterior Relations you say you have been told that we had doubts concerning the meaning of the convention, and mention the particular points on which these exist. Justice and a due regard to truth force us to contradict, in the most positive manner, this declaration. As yet we have felt no doubts or difficulties about the line of conduct prescribed to us as Commissioners under the convention; we have in no instance decided that money may not be embraced under the word supply or fourniture, or given any such opinion; nor have we on any occasion said that we should limit our examination to the claims founded upon the conjectural note, provided they did not exceed the 20,000,000 of livres. On the contrary, our records, as early as the 1st of August last, show that we entertain a very different opinion. Thus these reports, seeming to form the principal inducement for your official letter, being without foundation, we have a right to expect from you, sir, a conviction of its extreme impropriety as far as it relates to these, even could it have been justifiable under a different statement of the facts. With respect to our opinion of claims for freight, you have been more fortunate in the information you have collected. In believing that the French substantive fourniture cannot supply the place which might have been occupied by the French substantive fret, which has a precise, a definite, and even a technical meaning, we have felt neither doubt nor difficulty; and though we may not have consulted the best French authorities, when we do, we hardly expect to learn that our opinion is egregiously incorrect. Mr. Marbois thinks that, by a liberal construction, the word fourniture may be extended to the claims of freight. Though it would be extremely grateful for us to indulge our feelings in this respect, we cannot believe it our duty to take this liberty with a public trust. However just we may consider claims for freight to be examined apart from the convention, of which you cannot be more convinced than we are, yet as Commissioners we are not permitted to give way to our opinions upon abstract principles of justice. To do this would be as unjustifiable as to neglect the positive duties enjoined upon us, or rather the one act would amount to the other. But, sir, where is the difficulty upon this point, or why consult the French Government for our information? If your opinion be correct, that we can determine nothing, and that our decisions of every sort are to be submitted to your superintending care, why not wait until these cases come before you in the form which seems to be prescribed in the convention? You will then have an opportunity of taking your own view of the convention, or of adopting that of the French Government, and applying such construction to its various parts as you may think correct. This will place the responsibility of each agent, acting under the authority of the United States, where it ought to rest. Should it be the opinion of our Government that we have been too rigorous in our construction of this part of the convention, we assure you that we shall have more satisfaction in abandoning than we now feel pleasure in adhering to it. Your observations, addressed to the Minister of Exterior Relations, upon the character and probable amount of the conjectural note being intended to show the absurdity of an opinion which we never entertained, might not, perhaps, be considered as claiming our attention, and certainly would not had they not proceeded from any other person than yourself. But having your correspondence before us, and seeing therefrom the high estimation in which you once held that paper, it becomes us to remind you of your former opinions; ours have been uniform upon its character, as our records show, however you may at this moment shrink from the recollection of that note being solemnly made a part of the compact; it is now too late; conventions that passed during the negotiations—things that were intended to have been done, but were forgotten—will perhaps tend very little to mend the deformities which are seen upon its face, or relieve your mind from the reflections that must fill it, when you reconsider your former opinions, recorded by your own pen, of the importance attached to that paper. The more these deformities are, the greater will be the surprise that it should have ever gained the rank it does hold under the convention. The convention says it is a part of itself. To fix this, the language is as strong as any that could be used for that purpose; it was received at your hands. Your single letter of the 7th of July, in answer to one addressed from this Commission, jointly to yourself and Mr. Monroe, stands recorded in this office, in which you say the 'note delivered to you by Mr. Skipwith was, as he informed you, received directly from me as the conjectural note referred to in the convention.' At that moment, which was the most proper one for giving an opinion upon the note, you lent your aid in maintaining its character, and the only endorsement which we perceive it has is that of your single name. Never, until reading your letter to the Minister of Exterior Relations, could we expect to see you unfriendly to it. Your letters, which we can never forget, are before us. In that of the 16th of November, when you undertook to censure our conduct for not first examining the liquidated claims—which we did not do, for the simple reason that none such were in existence—you use language in reference to this note which we never will call upon you to reconcile with that you have lately held. You say 'if any doubts could possibly exist on that subject, that doubts must give way upon seeing the lists given in, both by the French Boards and Mr. Skipwith. The first of which is expressly referred to in the convention.' Again you remark, 'besides, the liquidated claims are specially referred to in the list by their names and dates.' Here such was your affection for the conjectural note that you adhered to it when, among its other absurdities, it mentioned a description of claims which did not exist. Sir, you were not content with this, giving way to your feelings, because we would not obey the conjectural note upon a point it was impossible for us to do; you not only reminded us of the responsibility, in departing from it, which we owe to our country, and which we will always submit to, but threatened us with our being answerable in our private capacity to individuals.

"Your words are these: 'Your duty then is plain; and in taking up any other rule than that which you admit is prescribed by the convention, you act without authority, and must render all your acts doubtful, and in my opinion not only make yourselves answerable to the Government collectively, but in your individual capacity to any person that you may injure, by stepping out of the line which you yourselves admit to be prescribed to you.'

"After these extracts from your letters, you will hardly charge us with insincerity in declaring our surprise at your letter to the Minister of Exterior Relations, in which, among other things, you say that note never was annexed to the convention. We will press this subject no further. In giving to the conjectural note only that preference which it holds under the convention, by first deciding the claims found upon it, you will see us again, as we hope you always will when they come in contact, sacrificing our feelings as individuals to our duty as Commissioners.

"As to the calculations which you make upon the probable result of the conjectural note which may be embraced by the convention, we possess no data by which to judge of their correctness, and of course furnish you none. Being unconnected with the liquidations to be made in the French bureaus upon such claims as we say are susceptible of it, and not knowing, if your construction of the convention be a sound one, how many of our rejections may be resuscitated by the French Government, we can at present have no opinion upon the subject. Time and the progress of the business can alone shed the light which is necessary to produce satisfaction upon this head. We are willing to wait for the result as far as our reputations are involved. We do not know whether the class of claims arising from prize causes, and the 3,377,906 livres which were in the French offices on the 30th of April, 1803, but not upon the conjectural note, were before you when your calculations were made. Were we, sir, to take that species of evidence in forming a judgment of what your opinions will be upon the particular claims that may come before you under the forms of the convention, which you have received in guessing at ours, and thereupon founding an official letter, we should be less inclined to believe that twelve or twenty millions will cover the debts even found upon the conjectural note than we are at present."

[Extracts.]

"Your observations on the propriety of my endeavoring to clear up doubts on the convention, by an application to the French Government, need no particular notice. When I shall believe that the President, in making me his minister, or Mr. Monroe and myself, in fixing upon you for Commissioners, meant to give you a control over the official conduct of the minister, I shall submit to you the reasons of my measures. Some very happy circumstances, however, have arisen from those I have adopted in this instance. 1st. They have settled the opinion of the French Government, at least upon the subject of freight, and thereby assured that justice to a number of our fellow-citizens which you declare you do not consider yourselves as authorized to afford them. 2d. They have also called forth an opinion, which you certainly have not before given, that money is to be considered as supply. It was quite, however, as natural that the French word fourniture would supply the place of the French substantive fret as that of the French substantive argent. But you, I presume, gentlemen, know how to justify the ingenious distinction you make. 3d. And if they had not produced a change in your sentiments, they will at least relieve the anxiety of a great number of our fellow-citizens, who have, I believe, without the exception of a single creditor in Paris, believed that you did not intend to liquidate any debt not included in the provisional note. It is possible, and I must now presume so from your assertion, that they inferred thus from your silence, yet the fact is that many of them came to me directly from the Board, and from Mr. Skipwith, in great apparent distress, shortly after you began your operations for the second time, and inquired whether they were precluded by not being on the provisional note, asserting that they had been so informed by some or all the Commissioners, or by their agent; and it is also a fact that this opinion is even now generally entertained by every American creditor in Paris that I have conversed with. It would have been happy, then, gentlemen, if you had thought proper at an earlier day to make an avowal of a contrary sentiment; and I shall felicitate myself in having procured it even at this late hour, since it is not only necessary to the peace, but to the essential interest of creditors. Claims of this class might otherwise be, and probably have been, from the prevalence of a contrary sentiment, the object of speculation at an under value.

"These reasons, as well as the propriety of fixing and making known the sentiments of the French Government on this important point, evince the advantages that have already resulted from my taking their sense on this subject.

"A great many pages of your letter is taken up in reasonings and quotations to show that I considered the provisional note as giving a priority to the cases mentioned in it. Upon this I never entertained any doubt, nor does my letter to the Minister of Exterior Relations maintain a contrary sentiment. You say you embraced with pleasure the earliest means of enabling me to remedy the mischiefs that would result from your delays, and you did this by informing me, after you had sat nine months, and passed forty-five cases, that you had done so. The first notion you ever thought proper to give me on this subject being by your letter of the 9th instant, whatever my solicitude may be upon this subject, so interesting to many of our fellow-citizens, yours, gentlemen, does not seem ever to have been greatly awakened.

"I find, as you say, that you did not clearly comprehend the clause of my letter which speaks of the difficulty of making arrangements with the French Government for the discharge of the debt due out of the twenty millions to be paid by our Government, or by the French Government, in case the debts due by them should not be comprised without information as to the form of your certificate; and yet a little attention, one would have imagined, would have rendered it very plain, and not inconsistent with my idea of drawing bills so early as last September.

"Not foreseeing any of the difficulties or delays which have arisen in the execution of a very simple trust, I presumed that you would have passed a great proportion of the cases upon which there was no doubt in the course of a few weeks; and I found no difficulty in adjusting the forms of your Board, and that of the French Board, in such manner as to occasion no delay; for at that time the Board had none of those scruples which prevented my free communications with them. When they acted otherwise, it was not in my power to make arrangements which might or might not be necessary, according to the forms in which the certificate of the Board was drawn; and what that was, they did not think proper to communicate. A reason of personal delicacy, also, restrained me from pressing this business for the few claims that had passed. The first claims that the Board passed, before Mr. Maclure's arrival gave birth to the subsequent delays, included one of my brother. Had I got the former settled, I must have drawn bills for this; and when I saw from the conduct of the Board that many months were to elapse before other claims were liquidated, I did not choose to expose myself to the censure of partiality by giving him a preference over other creditors.

"The second member of the paragraph is equally obvious. Such debts as were justly due, but not payable out of the twenty millions, because not embraced by the convention, are still a charge upon the French Government. Till, therefore, I knew what claims you had rejected, and upon what principle, it was out of my power to make any arrangements with them. In this view, therefore, as well as many others, your secrecy and want of communication with me has been injurious to the public creditor."

"I could wish you had been more explicit, as I am at a loss to guess at your meaning when you speak of my having taken steps, in concurrence with certain individuals in Paris, in relation to the Board. I have taken no steps with any individual, other than as far as possible to calm the anxiety of the claimants, and to lessen the resentments that they have universally felt at the delays, the secrecy of the Board, and the hauteur with which they have so generally complained of having been treated."

Mr. Madison to Mr. Livingston, dated March 23, 1804.

[Extract.]

"In my letter of the 31st of January, expressive of the wishes of the President in relation to such modifications of the late convention with France as might impart its benefits more equally and justly among the claimants, it was omitted to suggest an arrangement for the immediate relief of such of them as are in that country, and might suffer from the disappointment and delay consequent upon the endeavor to effectuate the proposed modifications. It has however occurred, as a reasonable attention to their situation, that there should be made to them, after the adjustment of their claims by the Board, a partial advance of bills upon the Treasury to an amount which might certainly fall within the sums to be ultimately paid them, after the curtailings which the proposed modifications shall require, of the sums liquidated as due from France, under the provisions of the convention as it now stands. You will be pleased, therefore, to consider this suggestion as a part of the plan for remodifying it, and, with the consent of the French Government, take measures for its being carried into effect."

Postscript of a letter from Mr. Livingston to Messrs. Mercer, Barnet, and Maclure, United States Commissioners of Claims, dated Paris, March 26, 1804.

"P. S. I have kept my letter of yesterday open that I might send you copies of Captain Sinclair and Mr. Johnson's certificates, hereunto annexed. I believe you will, upon reading them, admit that some of the Board at least have supposed that money was not supplies, and that they have all of them given the American creditors reason to believe that they considered no claim as within the convention that was not in the provisional note. If further proof of this is necessary, it shall be furnished to you.

"For what purpose this idea was encouraged, and the American claimant not only distressed but essentially injured by the depreciation of his claim, you, gentlemen, have to account to them and to the public; and still more so if, as you say, you never changed your sentiment, or to an avowal of that which you openly have declared on your first assembling."

No. 519.

Messrs. Mercer, Barnet, and Maclure, to Mr. Livingston, dated Paris, April 30, 1804.

[Extract.]

"The principles which we have deduced from the convention of the 30th April, 1803, and applied to the claims, were noticed generally in our letter to you of the 22d March, but it may not be improper to repeat them here. We consider the claims of American citizens upon the French Government, due under the convention of 1800, as directed to be settled according to the regulations and principles established in that under which we have been appointed. We have therefore considered it our duty to inquire—

"1st. Whether the debt was due in its origin to an American citizen?

"2d. Whether it existed before the 30th September, 1800?

"3d. Has such an American citizen established a house of commerce in foreign countries in partnership with foreigners?

"4th. Can he, by the nature of his commerce, be considered as domiciliated abroad?

"5th. Has he, under the circumstances of his case, a right to the protection of the United States?

"6th. Was the merchandise or other property American when it passed into the hands of the French Government?

"7th. Does the claim arise from supplies, embargoes, and captures made at sea, excluding from the word supplies, freight, indemnity, and demurrage, except where they are claimed as incidental to embargoes?

"8th. In prize cases we shall examine whether order of restitution has been made by the Council of Prizes. Whether the insufficiency of captors is shown.

"9th. We consider it correct to examine the cases upon the conjectural note before any other, to decide upon them according to their respective dates, when the state of the papers will allow us to preserve this order.

"10th. We consider it a fair construction of the convention that we have no authority to direct any liquidation after the 20,000,000 of livres shall be covered, and that our duties here will terminate on the 21st of October next, that being the day, according to our information, which will complete the year from the time when the ratification was exchanged at Washington.

"It appears that there are at present one hundred and forty-eight claims in the French Office of Liquidation alone, not included in the conjectural note; copies of sundry papers belonging to sixty of them being before us, their amount, exclusive of the interest, appears to be upwards of six millions of livres. What proportion of them may be embraced by the principles of the convention we are unable at present to determine, not having come, in the order of our proceedings, to such an examination as to decide definitively upon their merits.

"We have directed the liquidation of one hundred and forty-seven cases found upon the conjectural note, including ninety-seven which arise from the Bordeaux embargo. You will perceive that we can form no idea of what will be their amount, as we have no agency in the liquidation. We learn from Mr. Skipwith that only sixteen of them have been finally liquidated; should this part of the business be permitted to linger as it has done, we despair of seeing, in the language of the convention, 'every necessary decision made' within the time limited therein. This circumstance obliges us to request your attention to the subject of our letter of the 9th of March. The motives that induced us to write it are strengthened by this statement of our progress and that of the French Departments. We do not expect, however, that it will be in your power to obtain for us complete information as to the amount of the liquidations before we shall have finished with the conjectural note, as we shall be engaged but a few days longer with the claims founded upon it. The nominal amount of the principal on the note being nearly the sum for which we consider the United States responsible, and the liquidations not being made, we can see no course left for us to take, except in future so to modify our certificate of admission as to render the liquidation to be made thereon conditional, and dependent upon the amount which may be ultimately due upon the note."

No. 520.

Mr. Livingston, Minister to France, to Messrs. Mercer, Barnet, and Maclure, dated Paris, May 1, 1804.

GENTLEMEN: I have received your letter of the 30th April. I reserve myself to make, at a moment of leisure, the observations it gives birth to. I have always considered your previous certificate of a debt being susceptible of liquidation, not only as totally unnecessary, but actually injurious in every case in which the French Board were disposed to liquidate, since it was only designed to save them trouble, and this applies to every case which they had taken up previous to your certificate. The object of this letter is to send you an extract from one I have received from the Secretary of State, dated 31st January, previous to mine in which I speak of your delays, and enclose your first letters. It is evident that the Secretary of State had received some relation that had given him improper impressions of the convention. The mode, however, in which the President wishes to have the doubts which it is supposed to contain, and extend it, as was always intended, to every case in the treaty of 1800, you will observe is exactly that which I had previously taken to remove your doubts, and lead you to a just and liberal construction of it. To this you thought proper to reply by thirteen pages of censure and abuse; I am now to request you, in future, to conform strictly to the explanations of the treaty contained in the note of Mr. Marbois, the Minister of the Treasury, to Mr. Talleyrand, of 17th Ventose, (16th March,) since this note has been approved by the minister, and is so far to be considered as an assent of the French Government to that liberal construction of the convention that the President's wishes, concurring with common justice, require. The extract also shows the sense of our Government upon the narrow construction you appear to put upon a clause of the convention that was never intended to preclude the claims of American citizens who had not been domiciliated abroad, so far as it related to their individual claims, but to such partnership connexion as could only be claimed by the house, which, from its nature and situation, should be considered as foreign. If your doubts on this head still remain, I shall proceed, agreeably to the order of my Government, to obtain from France such further explanation as will serve to judge your decisions. I shall, for this purpose, expect to receive from you, from time to time, a report of those decisions of the principles by which they are governed, whenever they narrow the limits, which it is the wish of the President, as it was the intention of the parties, to give to the convention.

I am, &c.,

ROBERT R. LIVINGSTON.

Extract of a letter from the Secretary of State [referred to in the preceding letter of Mr. Livingston] to Mr. Livingston, Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States at Paris, January 31, 1804.

"Should the French Government refuse to concur in any proposition that will restore the latitude given to claims as defined by the first convention, [convention of 1800,] and which is narrowed and obscured by the text of the last, it will be proper to settle with the Government, if it can be done, such a construction of this text as will be most favorable to all just claims, particularly those for freight, indemnities, and property put in requisition, and the separate property of individuals who are concerned in the disqualifying partnerships mentioned in the convention, which are said to be threatened with rejection by the Board at Paris."

No. 521.

Messrs. Mercer, Barnet, and Maclure, to Mr. Livingston, dated Paris, May, 2, 1804.

SIR: We have just received your favor dated yesterday. Having never felt ourselves authorized to take for our conduct any other rules than those prescribed by the convention of 1803, we shall continue to decline acting upon your construction of that instrument instead of our own. Until you obtain from the French Government, to be sanctioned by the authority of our own, the modifications which it now appears you are required to propose, we shall pursue the principles which, upon the most mature deliberation, we believe fairly deducible from the convention as it now stands. Solicitous, from the beginning, to do only what that directs, and to obtain only the approbation of the administration whose agents we are, we derive infinite consolation from the extract which you send us of the Secretary of State's letter. It contains, notwithstanding your construction, a complete justification, as far as it goes, of the meaning which we have given to the convention. "When the latitude given to the claims as defined by the convention of 1800, which is narrowed and obscured by the text of the last, shall be restored," we will then readily change our opinions with the changes which will then be regularly made.

We do not consider a correspondence between yourself and the ministers of the French Government, upon the subject of national compact, ratified by the supreme authority of each country, as changing its character, and must, therefore, decline giving to it that influence which you require.

You say, "if our doubts still remain, you will proceed, &c.;" our letters in your possession sufficiently show that we had no doubts; that we consider our construction of the convention as clear and correct; and, if your intention in proceeding is to remove doubts which we have entertained, it will be unnecessary; but if you intend, in obedience to the above extract, to make such modifications in the convention of 1803, as to embrace claims which at present it rejects, we shall consider it our duty to take them as parts of the convention, when they shall be sanctioned by the proper and competent authorities.

We have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servants,

JOHN MERCER.

Mr. Livingston to Messrs. Mercer, Barnet, and Maclure.

PARIS, May 2, 1804.

GENTLEMEN: I have this moment received your letter of this date. In a matter of such consequence as that on which we write it is necessary that there should be nothing equivocal. I am, as you find, directed by the President to settle with the Government of France, if it can be done, such a construction of the text of the convention as will be most favorable to all past claims, particularly for freights. On the subject of freight, I have obtained an official note from the French Government, and submitted the same to you. In this I have anticipated the wish of the President. I shall proceed to get their decisions upon the other points which the President thinks are obscure in the convention, since there is no doubt that they are obviously within the intention and meaning of that instrument. I wish to know whether, in this case, you are disposed to pay them that respect which can alone render the explication useful, or whether I am to understand that you will, in every case, adhere to the sense which you have put upon the convention, whatever may be the decision of the French Government in concurrence with the wish expressed by the President? I now ask you, gentlemen, explicitly to inform me what you mean by the constituted authorities in your letter? and whether it is your intention to consider every explication of the treaty by the French Government, given at the request of the President, either as a nullity to which you will pay no respect, or as an act that requires a formal ratification before it influences your decision?

This I understand to be the sense of your letter of this day; but, as your letter may lead to very important consequences, I beg that I may be furnished with such a reply as will leave no doubt upon the subject. As the Government's express is only detained till I can communicate to the President your answer, and the measures that it will oblige me to take, I pray you to reply to this as soon as you find it convenient, and I would also wish to know (whatever sentiment you may collectively express as a Board) whether you individually concur therein.

I am, gentlemen, your most obedient, humble servant,

ROBT. R. LIVINGSTON.

No. 523.

Messrs. Mercer, Barnet, and Maclure, to Mr. Livingston, dated Paris, May 3, 1804.

SIR: Your letter of yesterday is just presented. It was not our intention to leave you in doubt about the meaning of our answer. We are not surprised, however, that you should have felt doubts as to what we intended to say, since you have read it with so little attention as to call upon us for the explanation of an expression which it does not contain. Our answer was written with the short extract of the Secretary of State's letter before us. We, of course, used the language which that uses. You are directed to make to the French Government propositions for restoring the latitude found in the convention of 1800; and, upon their refusing to concur in these propositions, to settle with the Government, if it can be done, a certain construction of the last convention. These instructions are given for the purpose of producing a change in a national compact to which the supreme authorities of each country, according to the forms of their respective constitutions, have given validity. This cannot be changed so as to have an influence upon the convention of 1803, but by the intervention of the same authority which brought it into existence. As yet we have seen no act of the French Government upon this subject. The note of Mr. Marbois, written before the arrival of your instructions, and embracing points to which those do not apply, as well as some to which they do apply, is not clothed with the authority competent to change, on the part of France, the convention as it now stands.

If we are bound to follow the opinions of Mr. Marbois in one part of his letter we are equally bound to follow the whole. This would confine us in the examination of American claims to two points only, when the convention expressly requires that we should apply to them all the principles which it contains. We are not apprised, by the extract from your instructions, whether it is the wish of the administration that we should pursue this course. If we are bound to follow the opinions of the officers of the French Government in their construction of one part of the convention, we are equally bound to take their construction upon every other part, and that by occasionally transmitting to us, through you, their opinions upon separate and detached papers, the convention, which is sanctioned by the highest authorities of both countries, would become annihilated by their subordinate agents, and the establishment of this Board be rendered an absurdity. Though the letter of Mr. Marbois is not that act of the French Government which is necessary to introduce in its parts the modifications which are desired by none more than ourselves, yet it serves the useful purpose of showing what may be the disposition of the Government when it shall be addressed in obedience to the instructions which you have received from the American administration. The language of these is plain: it is that you shall attempt to restore with the French Government the latitude given to the claims by the convention of 1800; but, upon failing in this, then to settle with the Government a certain construction. By the Government, as used in your instructions, we understand to be meant the same authority on the part of France which ratified the convention now proposed to be changed. The modifications to be made must be equal in validity to the provisions of the convention; and to have this character they must be stamped with the same authority. When this shall be done according to the well known usages of both Governments, the disposition which we have shown to adhere rigorously to the convention ought to have been a sufficient pledge to you of the readiness with which we shall pursue the changes which will then become a part of it. But, sir, to leave no doubt on your mind of our meaning, we will state your question and our answer. You ask "whether we will, in every case, adhere to the sense which we have put upon the convention, whatever may be the decisions of the French Government in concurrence with the wish expressed by the President?" Our answer is that we will adhere, in every instance, to the sense which we have put upon the convention, except where the changes produced by the French Government, as explained above, shall alter its character in conjunction with the wishes of the American administration, conveyed to us according to the principles of the Federal Constitution. To know how far the modifications which you may make with the French Government are sanctioned by the views of the administration, and how far these again are sanctioned by the Federal Constitution, though we cannot for a moment indulge the belief but they are in perfect accordance with them, we shall expect not only the act of the French Government which shall contain the modifications, but a full view of the wishes of the American administration, conveyed in their own language as far as they use any in relation to this Board. As yet you have communicated but twelve lines of their despatches, expressly relating to your duties and not ours. They are intended to make a part of the basis of your negotiation, upon the result of which we may be required to take another view of the convention. If you have received any opinions from the administration of what it wishes our conduct to be we shall be happy to have them before us. They shall receive from us that respectful attention to which they are entitled.

We have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servants,

JOHN MERCER.

No. 524.

Mr. Livingston to the Secretary of State of the United States, dated May 3, 1804.

"Mr. Leonard delivered on the 26th of April your favor of the 31st January, together with a triplicate of the same; the duplicate of which, I suppose, has been sent by some other conveyance, but has not yet reached me; so that, till his arrival, I had no letter from you since the 15th January. I also received by the same messenger your favor of the 7th February. Nothing would be more happy than the arrival of the stock; its delay has occasioned great anxiety, as the bankers were on the spot ready to take up their bills, which the present state of things made the Treasury very anxious to turn into money. I have happily got rid of this very burdensome deposit, and paid over the bills and the stock, and got a full discharge by triplicate receipts, one of which I forwarded to Mr. Gallatin. I should be happy if the business of the commission had been as readily terminated; and am sorry that you have not been able to find the leisure to consider it, as I think you would have found many real difficulties in the way of its settlement. Your instructions to negotiate a new explanatory treaty proceeds upon the idea that the convention does not include all the bona fide debts provided for by the convention of Morfontaine. Whatever inaccuracy there may be in the expression, it was certainly the intention to make it extensive, except so far as to preclude foreigners and foreign property from its provisions. The first article shows clearly that this was the object of the treaty; nor do I think that the subsequent words control, though they certainly somewhat obscure the sense. The fact was, I had drawn the convention with particular attention; it did not exactly meet with Mr. Monroe's ideas, to whom the subject was new; it produced some modifications, and these again, which would have fully answered our purposes, were struck out by Mr. Marbois' wish to give a preference to debts that had a certain degree of priority in the French bureaus. The moment was critical; the question of peace or war was in the balance, and it was important to come to a conclusion before either scale preponderated. I consider the convention as a trifle compared to the other great object; and as it had already delayed us many days, I was ready to take it under any form, being persuaded that the intention was fully declared, and that the interest of both nations concurred with the justice due to individuals in giving it a liberal construction; that the principles on which it was to be settled would meet with no difficulty; and had it not been for our unfortunate selection of Commissioners, the whole would have been determined before now, and near two millions of interest would have been saved to the public, and much distress to the creditors; my idea of the manner in which this business should have been taken up is fully detailed in my former letters; and in a bargain of such advantage to our country, and which has astonished all Europe, I think we should have no hesitation to comply with it literally, and even to take upon ourselves the satisfaction of our claimant citizens, if it should exceed the amount of a million of dollars, and render ourselves creditors of the French Government for the excess. But my sentiment can have no weight in this business; it is my duty and my intention, as far as possible, to comply with your instructions. Your letter suggests two modes of rendering the construction of the convention sufficiently extensive to embrace all the objects of the convention of 1800; the first is a new negotiation, and next such an explanation by the French Government as will do away the doubts that narrow the construction. As I know that the French Government believe the last convention embraces all the objects of the first, if I were to propose a new convention on these points they would tell me that it was unnecessary; they would insist upon our executing it in the most liberal manner, which they can force us to do as the ultimate decision lays with them, and they would call upon us to pay the accumulating interest; besides which the whole busines would, in that case, be suspended till the new convention was ratified, to the great injury of the public creditors and the manifest loss of interest. The second mode of removing doubts had early suggested itself to me, and had the Commissioners at Paris consulted me their doubts would have been dispelled as soon as mentioned. This, however, they refused to do; when, after some time, I was informed of the nature of them, I made the application to the French Government contained in my note of the 24th of February last, transmitted to you. You find the answer was such as the President wishes to have. The Commission have not, however, thought fit to act upon it; I have, since the receipt of your favor, written them the enclosed letter, transmitting an extract of your direction; and should they after this refuse to conform to the explanations given by the French Government I shall probably find it necessary to comply with the general wish of the creditors of this Government and suspend them; for, as the treaty reserves to the French Government, it would be very absurd to say that our Board shall not be governed by their constructions of the convention, when that construction is such as does the most ample justice, and is most conformable to the wish of our own Government. Indeed, the easiest and simplest way to arrive at a just construction of the treaty and a termination of all the difficulties is to remove the present Commissioners and substitute others. There is a passage in your letter on this subject that is so repugnant to my own feelings that I believe I have misunderstood the sense of it. After directing me to get a construction of the convention as will be most favorable to all just claims, particularly for freight, &c., you add, "it is to be kept in view, however, that in case the whole sum of 3,750,000*d* should not be absorbed by the construction of the Board, the construction settled with the French Government is not to enlarge the sum to be paid by the Treasury of the United States beyond that to which the Treasury would be liable by the construction of the Board;" the only sense in which I can understand this is, that you are willing that justice should be done if it cost you nothing; but if, after having made a bargain which you acknowledge to be good, you can still make a saving out of the purchase money at the expense of the just claims of our fellow-citizens or of France, by setting up the unjust and illiberal constructions of the Board, I must adhere to such construction. I believe, sir, I must have misapprehended you in the paragraph, which I should find the utmost pain in carrying into effect, as repugnant to the liberal spirit which has hitherto governed our negotiations. The attempt, too, would add as little to our pecuniary acquisitions as to our character for candor and liberality; for the French Government foresaw that as the Commissioners were mere agents of our Government, that a great proportion of the twenty millions given by them for the payment of their debts might go into the hands of the Treasury, if our agents chose to narrow the construction of the convention, and thus the creditors be left unsatisfied, or turned over upon them; they therefore insisted (and we could not dispute the propriety of the demand) that, as we were only their bankers till the debt was paid, they should have the ultimate decision in cases which our agents thought proper to reject. Now it is certain that France will take care, if there are any claims due under the convention of 1800 unsatisfied by the narrow construction of our agents, to extend the last convention to all such claims. The attempt, therefore, to save any part of the purchase money, at the expense of France or the creditors, to which the ingenuity of our agents appears to be at present directed, would be as futile as it is disreputable. You see in Mr. Marbois' letter the light in which our Board are viewed; and you may, therefore, be persuaded that little attention will be paid to their construction; which, therefore, it will be more honorable, as well as more just, for us to render as liberal as possible in the first instance, for, as the Board are considered as mere examining Secretaries, these illiberalities would be imputed to a wish in our Government to make a saving out of the money of France, intrusted to us for the most just and fair objects, and that at the expense of our citizens whose distresses we have so often and so fully described. I have in my former letters explained to you my reasons for not directly applying to the Government for more time as you instruct me; happily the ministers have yet neglected to make the arrangements that are necessary to precede the drawing of the bills, and though this arises from mere inadvertence, and I could have the order in twenty-four hours, yet I have thought it better to leave the delay at their door and not at ours, because it will not only afford us an apology but give a reason for not charging ourselves with the interest. I shall still pursue this policy till they have themselves removed every obstruction to the drawing of the bills, after which I shall, in compliance with your order, ask for further time, though I apprehend many inconveniences from the request. I mentioned to you the necessity of instructing me on the subject of the interest that shall accumulate on account of our delay; I am very sorry you are not explicit on that subject, unless I am to understand as implied in your direction that our Treasury shall in no case be charged beyond the twenty millions. If so, what reply am I to make if the French Government agrees to give a further time, but insists on our paying the accumulating interest? If I refuse it, they will think it very extraordinary that we should retain their money in our Treasury after having received a full equivalent for it, and that they should, for our convenience, pay interest on their own capital; can I ask this? or, if I do, can I expect that so unreasonable a request will be granted? Will they not impute all the past and future delays to very improper motives? If they will only grant the delay on these terms what am I to do? I am totally uninstructed, unless, as I have mentioned, the not charging the Treasury further is, as I understand it, a positive and overruling instruction that is to supersede the other if they cannot both be obtained. I shall act upon this supposition, and, to avoid bringing this question to a point soon, take no steps to make the necessary arrangements for drawing the bills, and perhaps avail myself of this moment for going to England; so much time will be gained by this as will enable you to reply to the difficulties stated in my several letters, and afford me some precise and decided instructions thereon. I do not think, with you, that there are just claims which have not yet been brought in. After the convention of Morfontaine, our people expected payment, and sent their claims, and more particularly since the last convention, the claims that have lately come in were for the most part very doubtful ones, and a longer time will only open a door to frauds, nor does it seem reasonable that the whole mass of creditors should be distressed by withholding of their debt on account of the negligence of those who have not brought forward their demands in four years from the year 1800. It is to be considered, too, that all our difficulties have arisen from this negligence. We calculated the demands upon the debts brought forward, and we much more than reviewed them. Now a great excess of new ones increase the mass; will it not also be a question whether we have a right to diminish the payment of those whom the treaty provides for, by letting in others who have neglected to avail themselves of its advantages? As, therefore, your instructions on this head are discretionary, I shall wait your ulterior orders for its execution. I have taken measures for ascertaining, as far as possible, the amount of the demands now in the French bureaus. It has struck me that the simplest way to attain the object the President has in view, (a distribution of the debt,) with the least distress to the creditors, and without accumulation of interest, will be to get the French Government to certify only the principal in the first instance, and to leave the interest uncertified; by this means I may satisfy all the creditors the amount of their principal, and the apportionment may take place, on the interest for which, if a new negotiation is necessary and a ratification of a new convention, there will be no accumulation of interest and much distress avoided. There is a circumstance attending all these delays that is very unpleasant; we have always represented the finances of the United States as being in the most flourishing state; this Government will naturally conclude, however, that if we had the money ready to meet the demand we would not incur an accumulation of interest; and they will view the whole conduct of the Commissioners as a chicane on the part of our Government to defer the payment, and more particularly if we endeavor to throw the interest upon France, or act in such a way as to appear to approve of these measures. The First Consul has already informed the minister that he expects the business will be brought to a close, and expressed some resentment at the delay. I attribute a considerable part of my weight here to the frank and open manner that I have endeavored on all occasions to maintain, and which I have declared to be the leading character of the President and administration of my country; this has created a confidence of which I feel the good effect in every transaction. I shall be distressed to take a step which may bear another face. In settling the sums due from embargoes, the French Government have, contrary to all expectations, granted more even than was asked in many cases, by applying one general principle of an old law to the cases, so that you will have to correct in the estimate I gave you the deduction I had made on that account, so that it is not improbable that there will be an excess of debt beyond the twenty millions, besides the interest we have suffered to accumulate; but what the amount of that excess will be I cannot yet ascertain."

"I shall cause the inquiry you directed as to application here for spoliations committed in Spanish ports; I do not myself recollect any; yet it is very possible that they may have been made even by me, since I should not have hesitated, had I been applied to, to have made them, upon the presumption that both Governments were liable where the spoliation was made in one country under a commission granted by another."

[Extracts.]

"SIR: I informed you in my last of my intention to comply with your instructions, and to obtain from this Government such an explanation of the convention as would embrace all the objects the President wished, and then to have proceeded to draw bills for the principal of the debts, leaving the interest as a fund for equalizing the demands, by dividing it among the creditors. By this means the further interest would have stopped, and the wants of the claimants would have been relieved; more than three millions of capital, which is now locked up, would have been usefully employed. I have assigned to you my reasons for preferring this to a new modification of the treaty, which would have required a new ratification and a new appropriation law. But what further influenced me is a conviction that no new convention will now be listened to, and that the very mention of it would bring on resolutions to carry the present one rigorously into effect. But the Commissioners, true to the system they have invariably pursued of embarrassing every measure, and distressing, as far as lays in their power, the public creditors, have, as you find by the enclosed letters absolutely refused to pay any attention to any such explanations as the French Government may consent to, and persist in maintaining that their own is, and shall be, the only construction of the convention, till it is modified by a new one."

"I have the satisfaction of seeing that not a single person here, native or foreigner, puts the misconstruction upon the convention that they do."

"I know that the First Consul is already dissatisfied, and that Mr. Talleyrand has orders to inquire into the reasons of their delay. The whole business is taken out of Mr. Marbois' hands. They have never been pleased at the delays the other parts of the treaty have met with. Be assured that, if a peace should be patched up to-morrow, or the descent be successful, the whole treaty would be rendered doubtful for our non-performance of this essential part of it. I speak not from prejudice, sir, but I think it a duty I owe to my country to tell you that, should delicacy lead to half-way measures, should you rely upon the conciliatory dispositions of the minister that is to succeed me, you hazard much more than you are aware of, particularly if you should appoint some not perfectly agreeable here. There is no medium. Those Commissioners must be removed, not only to satisfy the public creditors, but this Government, and to avoid the most dangerous consequences. Their obstinacy has, I think, its source in a belief that I am soon to go away, and that I shall be succeeded by a gentleman upon whose friendship they can rely. Should the gentleman they allude to be my successor, it would be the strongest reason for their removal. He will want every possible support here, for very obvious reasons." "If every agent is, at this distance from the seat of Government, to act in defiance of the advice and without the control of the minister, you will never be sure for a month of not being embroiled with foreign nations. I shall get out of the way as soon as possible, and spend a month in England, in order to prevent any application of this Government, which will force me to draw the bills, or to take upon myself the charge of breaking the convention. It appears to me that, before I return, the President will have had time to have considered the convention, to have seen that it is capable of being made to embrace every object of the convention of 1800, by very simple explanations, and to have given precise orders for its execution; and, I trust, he will have seen from my letters, and the complaints of the creditors, sufficient cause to have displaced the Commissioners long before this arrives. Another and a much better set may be elected here without difficulty, and the whole business closed in a few months. Should he, however, be of opinion that a new convention should be negotiated, no inconvenience can arise from the delay, since such a new convention cannot be carried into effect till after the next Congress shall have made the necessary appropriations; and, on the first notice of his intention, a new one may be set on foot under more favorable circumstances than the present. Indeed, this is not the moment to undertake anything new; the great arrangements for the change in the Government occupy the minister's whole time; and, as I have told you, the business relative to the convention has, within a few days, been taken out of Mr. Marbois' hands and placed in Mr. Talleyrand's, for reasons which you may in part conjecture, but which are too delicate for me to mention at present. The affair of the creation of an emperor goes on rapidly, and will be concluded in a very short time; many important consequences will result from it to France and to Europe. Your minister should be instructed how to act on the change, which you may consider as certain.

"I have the honor to be, sir, with the most respectful consideration, your most obedient, humble servant,

"ROBERT R. LIVINGSTON."

No. 526.

Mr. R. Livingston to Mr. Madison, dated June 19, 1804.

"I am at a loss to tell upon what ground Mr. Skipwith informed you that the dissatisfaction arising from the delays of the Board had subsided, since every day has added to them, and to my embarrassments about them. I sincerely wish that you had afforded yourself the leisure to examine the convention attentively. I believe it would have appeared that no new one was necessary to make it embrace all the objects that can interest our citizens, and in this opinion Mr. Monroe, with whom I have conversed on the subject in London, fully agrees.

"On the part of the French Government, I shall find a disposition to give it the utmost latitude. To what end there should a new treaty be negotiated which must create great delays and some legal questions at home, even if I should find a disposition in the French Government to enter upon the subject, which, however, I am persuaded I shall not. As to an equal distribution of the 20,000,000, there seems to be some equity in it, and I shall endeavor to obtain their consent to it, if the 20,000,000 should fall short, which is not yet ascertained, nor can be till the accounts are passed. Your direction to draw for a certain amount in favor of such persons as may be here, and in distress, is imposing upon me a very disagreeable task, since it puts it upon me to discriminate between persons equally entitled, and that while I am acting under a law which aims to render me personally responsible. Nor can it be necessary; for if I draw for only so much as such persons would certainly be entitled to, if a dividend was made of the 20,000,000, there can be no reason why this advantage may not be extended to all the creditors; many of those in America are doubtless distressed as well as those in Paris. I have therefore concluded, that, upon full consideration, it would be conformable to the President's wishes, and more consonant to the objects of the treaty, (as soon as I can receive the information necessary,) to make the dividend among all the creditors, if I can obtain the consent of the French Government thereto, and in the meantime, as your instructions are express as to a new treaty, I shall put in a note on the subject, though I fear the effect will only be a more rigid construction of the present one, and some complaint about the delay in its execution. On the subject of interest, I fear that this Government will not reason as you do. They have, it is true, stipulated to pay the interest, but at the same time they provided that there should be as little accumulation of interest as possible, by forming a Board who should make all the preparatory steps even before the ratification. The twenty millions was the money of France from the moment Louisiana was delivered, but the United States retained it in their hands, and by an act of their own servants here keep it from being applied to the uses to which it was appropriated by France. Is it not then extremely unreasonable that they should pay near two years' interest upon money of which the United States have the use? If so, why may not the United States retain this money ten years as well as two, and thus double the debt against the French Government? I must candidly confess that it appears to me that every day the liquidation has been unnecessarily protracted by our Board creates a fair claim against our own Government for the accumulation of interest; nor do I see any other way of getting rid of it than that I have hinted, to wit: that the French Board have, through negligence, not yet put the last hand to such accounts as have been passed, (a subject on which I have purposely been silent till now, that I find the Commission have begun to go on in earnest, as I am informed.) Whether they will admit the plea I know not, especially when they find that in truth this circumstance has caused no delay, since I am instructed to apply for a still further time. My own sentiment is, and always has been, that we should have drawn as fast as the accounts were settled, and even if the sum had exceeded the twenty millions, have paid it to our citizens and become creditors ourselves of the French Government—the excess, if no interest had been suffered to accumulate, would have been too trifling to notice, and would have been amply compensated by the uses to which this capital would have been applied in our own country. I am, however, sensible that this could not have been done but by the consent of the Congress."

No. 527.

Mr. Livingston to the Minister of Exterior Relations, dated Paris, June 27, 1804.

The undersigned Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States to the Minister of Exterior Relations:

SIR: The President of the United States being apprehensive that some expressions in the convention of Paris of the 30th April, 1803, go to narrow the ground of payment to the creditors of France which was provided by the treaty of Morfontaine has directed me to propose to the French Government such an explanatory convention as will do away all doubts upon that subject and render the latter treaty (as was originally intended) co-extensive with the first. The cases upon which doubts have arisen are: 1st. Demands for freights and indemnities. 2d. The separate property of American citizens connected with foreign houses; and 3d. Vessels taken after the treaty of 1800 and prior to the ratification.

The President, also, apprehending that the sum of twenty millions reserved out of the purchase money for Louisiana will not be adequate to [the] discharge of all the demands, and though he doubts not that whatever it will fall short will be faithfully discharged agreeably to the convention of Morfontaine, as it is confirmed by the Royal word of the Emperor; still, as no provision is yet made for the discharge of such surplus, (if any there should be,) owing probably to a belief that the twenty millions would be adequate to the object, I am directed to negotiate for the consent of the French Government that the sum of twenty millions be equally apportioned among all the creditors, as well as such further sum as may be due from the French Government, if the twenty millions should not be adequate to the object, and, in the meantime, that the drafts on the Treasury of the United States should be wholly suspended till the amount of such debt is accurately ascertained, or at least that the drafts be for only such a portion of the debts as will render it practicable to divide the same when the whole amount is known.

Your excellency will see the justice of this request on the part of the President of the United States, and I flatter myself will give them the support they merit with his Majesty the Emperor.

I pray you to accept the renewal of my assurances of high consideration.

No. 528.

Translation of letter from Mr. Marbois, Minister of the Public Treasury of France, to Mr. Livingston, dated July 1, 1804.

PARIS, le 11th Messidor, an 12, (July 1, 1804.)

SIR: The Minster of Exterior Relations sent me a letter which you wrote to him on the 19th ultimo. In consequence of which, and of the invitation of Mr. Talleyrand, I am about to apply to the Director General of Liquidation for the proofs you find necessary.

I observe, sir, your desire to form an approximate estimate of the debt, and to ascertain by how much it will exceed the twenty millions fixed upon for its liquidation. I request you to bear in mind that, during the negotiation in which I had the honor of being engaged with you, the sum of twenty millions of francs had been determined on in order to extinguish the whole American claim and the interest up to the day of the treaty, the entire execution of which the convention of the 10th Floreal, an 11, (April 30, 1803,) had for its object.

In regard to the stagnation of funds in the Treasury of the United States, long as they remain unemployed, I have reason to believe that your Government will delay the payment of them until you have informed them when they will become due, and when it will be in their power to meet them. There can be, therefore, no room for an accumulation of interest in consequence of the stagnation of the funds. I am not less convinced, sir, of the necessity of giving you the information you desire. Mr. Defermon having permitted no interruption in the undertaking, but, at my solicitation, I am persuaded that, through my request to him he will not delay the order to continue it.

I pray you, sir, to accept the assurance of my high consideration.

BARBE MARBOIS.

[Note subjoined to the original by Mr. Livingston.]

N. B. To this note I gave no answer, because I wished this business to come to me by a direct answer from the minister, in which case my answer, contesting the principles here hinted at, will come before the Emperor, and I will endeavor so to word them as to apply directly to his feelings.

No. 529.

Mr. Livingston to Mr. Defermon, Counsellor of State, dated Paris, July 15, 1804.

SIR: I have been honored by your letter of the 22d Messidor, in which you take notice of the number of new claims that have come in since the treaty, and express your surprise at their having been delayed for so long a period as eight or ten years, and desire to know whether I can give you any information on the subject, particularly of those from St. Domingo, which, as you say, compose a great proportion of the list. I am sorry to say, sir, that I am totally uninformed on the subject, which I have seen with as much surprise as you have, and not without much regret, since it has tended to deceive us in the estimate we made of the debt in forming the late convention. That small sums should not have been demanded before some express provision was made for the discharge of American claims is not surprising; but that many, and to a very considerable amount, and which must have made great part of the fortune of the claimants, should have been kept back till lately, is very extraordinary, and, perhaps, would justify a very strict examination into the nature and foundation of such claims. Be assured, sir, that while the President of the United States is extremely solicitous that full justice should be done to the claimants, he would see, with pain, any demand that bore the face of imposition on the Government of France, and will readily concur with you in their detection, if any fraud exists.

I embrace this opportunity, sir, to offer you my assurances of high respect and consideration.

ROBERT R. LIVINGSTON.

No. 530.

Mr. Madison to Mr. John Armstrong, Minister to France, dated July 15, 1804.

"Should any change in the French Government have taken place, rendering the style of your credentials inapplicable, you will be at no loss for the proper explanation. Should the new Government refuse to receive you without others, in another form, you will, of course, transmit the earliest notice. In the meantime, it may be expected that informal communications will enable you to pursue, with due effect, the objects claiming your attention.

"For such of these objects as were committed to your predecessor, the necessary instructions will be found in the correspondence of this Department with him. To these I refer you; remarking, only, that, if the equitable remodification proposed for the payments to be made to American creditors, under the article allotting twenty millions of livres for the purpose, cannot take effect without a formal convention, it is the intention of the President that such a one should be prepared and executed.

"As the French Government has no interest in objecting to the arrangements desired here, it is presumed that it will neither reject them nor require a more formal authority on your part for the negotiation. It need not be observed that, in whatever may be done, expedition is equally due to the interest of the creditors and to the solicitude of the President in their behalf."

No. 531.

Mr. Livingston to Mr. Madison, dated Paris, July 25, 1804.

"Since my last, 24th June, I have, in pursuance of your instruction, put in the enclosed notes on the subject of the convention. I have yet received no such official answer as will justify my further proceedings; since, till they determine either to open the negotiation you require, or reject it, or till they consent to a partial draught. Mr. Talleyrand is now absent, and Mr. Marbois' powers do not go to this object; so that I have been compelled to write again to Mr. Talleyrand for some precise answer. In the meantime, the French Board are making every exertion to get through the accounts, and have set, at my request, some additional clerks to work.

"In a conversation I had with Mr. Talleyrand, I find that they have no inclination to open any new negotiation, and that the Emperor has taken up the idea that the twenty millions was to cover the whole demand under the convention, and, for this reason, he will make it embrace as many objects as possible. Marbois finds himself in a disagreeable situation, because though this was also his intention, and he induced the Emperor to believe so, yet he admits that the words do not justify his construction that he proposes to set up, to wit, that the convention only applies to accounts that had actually been presented at the time; if so, which is, indeed, the fact, for we had no conception that anything due before September, 1800, could remain unasked 30th April, 1803, the twenty millions will not only cover the whole demand, but also leave a considerable excess in the hands of our Government. That he sees also, and has proposed to me to confine the sense of the convention to the debts actually presented; but to add, that, as there may be others which, though not standing so favorably from the neglect which induces a presumption against them, yet we consent to admit them. To this I tell him that I can only construe the convention agreeably to its letter; that if, as he supposes, and as it is strictly the fact, it is only confined to debts actually presented, it must rest with the generosity of our Government to apply the overplus money, which they may possibly do, in confidence that the French Government will also make provision to cover any deficit. Thus the matter rests at present."

No. 532.

Mr. Livingston to Mr. Madison, dated Paris, August 28, 1804.

[Extract.]

"I have yet received no answer to my note on the subject of the debt; this has arisen from two causes: first, the absence of the Emperor and ministers; next, their wish to know how far the 20,000,000 will comprise the whole of them, as they are very fearful of being charged beyond that. There is no doubt, from the strict manner in which they examine the accounts, that if the debts are confined to the words of the convention, to wit, to all that had been presented prior to its date, that it will not amount to 16,000,000, and I very much believe, that even including so much of what has since been presented which can be proved, that it will not exceed the 20,000,000. As the bureaus are going on very rapidly, I hope that I shall know before it is necessary to draw any bills."

No. 533.

Mr. Livingston to Mr. Madison, dated Paris, August 29, 1804.

[Extract.]

"Though I have received yet no formal answer to my note on the subject of the debt, yet I believe I have pretty well ascertained that it will reject any new negotiation, and that it will insist that we were to pay the whole of the debts due before the treaty of Morfontaine that came within the description of the treaty even if it exceeded the sum of 20,000,000."

No. 534.

The Minister of Exterior Relations to Mr. Livingston, dated Aix la Chapelle, 19 Fructidor, an 12, (September 6, 1804.)

[Translation.]

SIR: I have received the letters which you have done me the honor to write me, to demand that a new convention be concluded between France and the United States to explain the different clauses of that of the 10th Floreal, an 11, (May 1, 1803,) relative to American credits, and which may prescribe the manner of paying such creditors as are not comprehended in the list annexed to this convention.

The dispositions of the arrangement of the 10th Floreal, (May 1,) and the explanations which the plenipotentiaries intrusted with this negotiation have given to each other, cannot leave any doubt as to the clauses which appeared to you to-day susceptible of development. You will not have forgotten that it was then agreed upon between the two Governments to place under the charge of the United States all the claims of Americans upon France; to make an approximate valuation of them, the respective plenipotentiaries agreed to take as a basis the sum of all the claims, as well liquidated as unliquidated, which have been presented to the French Government by the Americans; this sum amounted to twenty millions, and as there was room to expect that the unliquidated portion would undergo some reduction, the American plenipotentiaries were persuaded that, even by admitting afterwards some claims which might not have been comprehended in the list, this addition of claims, compensated by the reduction that others would undergo at the time of the liquidation, could never exceed 20,000,000, the whole amount.

It was in consequence of these dispositions that some months ago you demanded the admission of different claims which had not been inscribed upon the list of liquidation; the French Government has shown itself disposed to consent thereto to the amount of twenty millions, so that they do not at any time hereafter exceed this sum, and that no part of the American claims be placed to the account of France.

In adhering to these dispositions, conformable to the treaty of 10th Floreal, (May 1,) and from which his Imperial Majesty will not deviate, any explanatory convention would be superfluous; and the intention of his Imperial Majesty is, to keep from all future question an affair completely terminated. The convention of the year 11, (1803,) foresaw the whole case; the whole of the American claims are to be placed to the account of the Federal Government; a list of them has been made. The liquidation of the articles of which it is composed shall be decided before the rest, if it does not reach the sum of twenty millions; other claims will be comprehended therein, but none shall be which exceed this sum, because it is at this point that the two Governments are agreed to stop.

You will, moreover, acknowledge, sir, that, if subsequent to these different payments, which will be made in conformity to the convention of the 10th Floreal, year 11, (May 1, 1803,) the United States had deemed it proper to admit, by an operation which to them might have been expedient, some other titles of claims before those which would have been reciprocally acknowledged by both Governments, France would not, under any circumstances, have been obliged to take cognizance of this operation, and to take it upon herself to guarantee the results of it; her engagements only proceed from her conventions; the same care and fidelity will be adopted by her in the observance as in the maintenance of the clauses.

Accept, sir, the assurance of my high consideration.

CH. MAU. TALLEYRAND.

No 535.

Mr. Livingston to Mr. Madison, dated Paris, September, 14, 1804.

[Extract.]

"I enclose the reply of the minister upon the subject of the debts. It is in the language I expected; and were it not that I was in hourly expectation of the arrival of General Armstrong, who will have your full instructions, I should reply to it, and show that when we assumed to pay to the amount of the twenty millions, it was not intended to discharge France from any excess, since the words of the treaty will justify this construction; though, in good faith, we really believed that we were making a gaining bargain, and for that reason procured the assurance that the excess should belong to us. This, from the statements we received both from the Treasury and from Mr. Skipwith, we had every reason to believe, and it would be candid to own that in one of the draughts, which was substantially agreed to, we justified the construction the minister has put upon the treaty. This article was, in rewording the convention, struck out without attention by Mr. Marbois, and as we saw the advantage it might give us was not observed on by Mr. Monroe and myself till he had left us; and, indeed, it seems to be almost too sharp to say we were to gain if the debts fall short, but not lose if they exceeded. I believe, however, that this is now a question of no moment, since there is every reason to think that the whole amount of claims due before the 30th of September, 1800, will fall very short of the twenty millions, even including the additional interest; for the French Board having examined them with great attention, found numbers, as might be expected, unproved; numbers fraudulent, and many paid to the agents of the parties here, who have neglected to give their principals information of it, and have again brought them forward, and now allege that they had forgotten the credit."

No. 536.

Mr. John Armstrong, Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States to France, to his excellency Barbe Marbois, Minister of the Public Treasury in France, dated Paris, May 20, 1805.

[Extract.]

"Your excellency says in the 6th and 7th paragraphs of your note that 'nothing can be more opposed to the true sense of the convention than Mr. Armstrong's definition of the respective duties resulting from it; that it is obviously the French Government that owes and that pays, and not that of the United States, whose minister is charged only to deliver bills in payment of debts liquidated and allowed by the French Government, and that this source of error is renewed in all the points of discussion upon which Mr. Armstrong enters.'

"I am very far from asserting or insinuating that I may not be in error—an opinion is certainly not infallible because it is mine; but if, on this occasion, I am wrong, I have both the consolation and excuse of being so in very respectable company; for not only the three ministers negotiating and framing the convention, but the two sovereigns also, who ratified it, have fallen into the same error.

"That this conclusion is neither hasty nor inconsiderate will be seen by examining the 3d article of the treaty, which contains these words: 'The principal and interest of the said debts shall be discharged by the United States by orders drawn by their Minister Plenipotentiary on their treasury.'

"Words cannot be selected more clear or precise. They leave nothing to doubt or to construction. They define expressly the mode in which, and the party by whom, payment shall be made; and it is only extraordinary that, with this article under your eye or within your recollection, your excellency should still contend that the French Government is the payer. But into this deduction you seem to have been necessarily drawn by your premises, which, to my view, are totally unfounded.

"Your argument stands thus: 'France owes certain debts to citizens of the United States; these debts are now to be paid; therefore France is to be considered the payer.' In this statement two or three material facts are altogether omitted, viz: That France has already paid these debts, to the amount of twenty millions of francs, by her transfer of Louisiana to the United States; that the United States have actually received this transfer sixteen months ago, and, in consideration thereof, have made arrangements for fulfilling all the obligations it imposes. Between the United States and citizens acknowledged to be her own there can be no immediate authority. Her responsibility is complete, and their confidence has never been shaken."

"The President and every impartial man must regret that the twenty millions granted by the convention for the payment of American claimants is not to be equally divided among them. I cannot believe that this Government would have opposed such a repartition; nor would they now refuse to accede, should it be possible to propose it. Indeed, in a conference with Mr. Marbois, on Friday evening last, he assured me that his Government would readily consent to any reasonable modification of the convention, whereby our Government might dispose of the twenty millions as they pleased, provided such modification did not impose on the French Government the necessity of making any further advance."

No. 538.

Mr. Skipwith, United States Consul, to Citizen Berlier, Councillor of State and President of the Council of Prizes, dated Paris, 27th Nivose, an 12, (January 18, 1804.)

[Translation.]

CITIZEN: You are not ignorant that, in virtue of the last convention between the French Republic and the United States, every prize taken from the Americans, for which an appeal has been entered, and the restitution of which has been ordered by the Council, must be, in case of the insolvency of the captors, reimbursed by the French Government out of a portion of the funds arising from the price of Louisiana, which both Powers have agreed to appropriate to the payment of the claims of the citizens of the United States.

Among the ships whose owners may come under the necessity of applying for this distribution there are some who were captured by privateers out of the French Antilles, having set sail either from St. Domingo, Guadaloupe, or from other possessions of the Republic, respecting the appeals laid before the Council of Prizes, and the sentences passed against these ships by the tribunals or other colonial authorities. It became necessary to send to those places the decrees of the Council for the summons of the captors, and for the papers of the procedures that led to their condemnation, against which they have protested.

None of the ordinances, however, have led to any result, although it has been more than a year since all of them were issued. No one could, it is true, promise himself any speedy prospects at a time when order was hardly restored in the various possessions of France, but who could now assign a period to these delays, when the intercourse of the colonies with the metropolis had been rendered almost impossible by the war; such delays could not but have been an injury to the captured, but their greatest cause of complaint is, to see themselves exposed to the loss of their rights under the convention, even in the case where the Council pronounced in their favor. Indeed, the duty relative to the execution of this convention ought to be irrevocably terminated within the space of a year; beyond which time no citizen of the United States should partake of the advantages resulting from it. But the commission charged with the performance is in complete activity; and the political situation of the colonies leaves no room to hope that the formalities, prescribed by the ordinances of the Council, can be immediately complied with; or, at least, that official information can be given of the execution of these ordinances as long as the war continues; and in this case, which is more than probable, the convention would not take effect in regard to a class of claims therein specially designated, and which, I venture to say, merited the particular attention of both Powers. It is, therefore, time to use such means as to prevent this disadvantage, whether by reviving from the present time those judgments rendered against ships, to obtain which the captured have produced sufficient evidence; or, at least, by fixing upon a term beyond which this revival shall take effect, should the captors not appear; proportioning, however, this delay as well to the urgency of circumstances as to the time already elapsed since the despatch of the ordinances of the Council of Prizes.

I must request you, Citizen President, to take into consideration the object of this letter, wherein many commercial houses of the United States are deeply interested, and to acquaint me, as soon as you possibly can, with the measures you may judge proper to take in consequence.

I avail myself of this occasion to present to you the assurance of my distinguished consideration.

FULWAR SKIPWITH.

Process verbal of the session of the Council of Prizes of the 11th Pluviose, year 12, (February 1, 1804.)

[Translation.—Extract.]

"After the reading of the letter from the Commercial Agent of the United States of America, dated 27th Nivose last, wherein he gives a statement that, in consequence of the difficulties presented by the actual state of the war to the intercourse of the colonies, the Americans interested in the affair of prizes, respecting which the Council has issued citations against the captors, are exposed to the loss of their rights under the convention concluded between the French Republic and the United States relative to the price of Louisiana, a part of which is allotted to the payment of American claims; he, in consequence, demands, in order that the term fixed upon by this convention may not expire before a decree be made relative to the claims laid before the Council, that it revise from the present time those judgments rendered against those ships; to obtain which, the captured have produced competent evidence; or that, at least, it fix upon a period beyond which this revisal shall take place if the captors do not appear, proportioning, however, this as well to the urgency of circumstance, as to the time already elapsed since the despatch of the ordinances of the Council.

"After having heard the observations of Citizen Lacoste, and those of the Commissary of Government, considering that the citizens of the United States of America have, more than all others, the means of corresponding with the ports whereat judgments were rendered for the confiscation of prizes; that, in their quality of neutrals, their navigation was entirely free, and that communications with the French colonies were open to them, whose ports they frequent in great numbers; and, therefore, it is incumbent upon those among them who are claimants to use due diligence to compel the captors to appear, or at least to prevent their departure, by publishing a notice of the ordinance of citation obtained against them; that if the effect of these ordinances were to be by any means retarded, the only remedy would be that both Powers consent to the continuation of the period first fixed upon by the convention.

"As to the Council, all it can do is to decide promptly on all the cases brought before it, accordingly as they are prepared to receive the decision; that the forms prescribed for, and an accordance with, the principles of justice] do not permit it to give judgment before the due preparation of the proceedings, one of the chief points of which is, that the parties be heard or duly cited; that, for the same reason, it cannot enjoin a delay fatal to the captors, for it would be unjust to punish them, by depriving them of their rights, for having disobeyed a rigorous citation which they could not have known; and, again, that such an act is not within the jurisdiction of the Council.

"The Council have resolved that, in the actual state of things, it could not make any change in the order established to preserve the respective rights of the parties relative to prizes made under American colors and carried into the colonies. This resolution will be transmitted to the Commercial Agent of the United States by the President of the Council."

Citizen Berlier, Councillor of State, President of the Council of Prizes, to Mr. Skipwith, Commercial Agent of the United States, dated Paris, the 25th Pluviose, year 12, (February 15, 1804.)

[Translation.]

The Council, sir, to which I have communicated the letter which you did me the honor to write me on the 27th of last month, and whereby you require, in the affairs of American prizes carried into the colonies, a revisal, the promptness whereof must correspond with the open delay the claimants were subjected to by the convention recently concluded between the French Republic and the United States, thought that, under the actual state of things, it could not change anything from the order established for the preservation of the respective rights of the parties in affairs of this nature. You will find, in the hereto annexed extract of its verbal process, the motives of its deliberation, of which I hasten, in compliance with your desire, to give you information.

Safety and esteem.

Mr. Skipwith, United States Consul at Paris, to Mr. Livingston, dated Paris, June 22, 1804.

[Translation.]

SIR: All my efforts, for more than a year, to obtain for the owner of the ship Rover the application of the last convention between the United States and France, not having produced any effect, I find myself under the necessity of applying to you, and of claiming your interference to bring this subject to a close, the principal circumstances of which I will give you as succinct an account as possible.

The Rover, Captain Patton, was captured in 1799 by the French privateer the Sans Facon, fitted out at Malaga by Peter La Rochelle; in 1803 the Council of Prizes annulling the judgment given by the French Council at St. Croix of Teneriffe, ordered the restitution of the ship and cargo, or rather their value, for they were sold by virtue of the first decision.

I immediately sent to my colleague, at Malaga, the decision of the Council, with the papers requisite for its execution, but the steps he took, assisted by the Commercial Agent of the Republic, to effect it, were entirely useless. It happened that Pierre La Rochelle, the real or pretended owner of the privateer Sans Facon, had fled, without having left at Malaga either property or security. They had recourse to the customary proceedings against the Spanish house, which was this owner's security, but with as little success.

I then addressed myself to the Minister of Exterior Relations, who, in a letter of the 20th Fructidor, year 11, remarked to me that he had written to Spain to demand of the Court of Madrid an order to compel this house to deposit the amount of the security which it had signed for the Sans Facon; I sent this information to my colleague at Malaga, who, more than three months after, wrote to me that neither the Commercial Agent of the Republic nor the Spanish Governor had received the authority or orders which were expected, and afterwards he satisfied me of the trivial effects of the instructions which the Minister of the Exterior Relations assured me he had communicated to the French minister at Madrid on this subject.

The result of these circumstances, a short expose of which is given, was the evident impossibility of recovering in Spain the value of the Rover and her cargo; and even had the signers to the security bond been compelled to deposit the sums they had signed, those sums were so much less than the value claimed that it would have afforded no great advantage.

So that nothing more was left to the owner of the Rover than the remedy pointed out by the 5th article of the convention. I wrote, in consequence, to the Minister of Exterior Relations to ask him to cause a decree, that, as the owner had actually become a creditor of the French Republic, he should be admitted under the liquidation established by the convention before cited.

The minister replied that he had submitted the affair to the Minister of Marine, and some time after, upon a letter lately received from me, having consulted the Director General of Liquidation, he was asked by the Director what papers I could exhibit? I therefore, in April last, sent him these papers; they show clearly the repeated steps taken at Malaga and their inefficacy.

I have since submitted this subject to the Department of Marine, of Exterior Relations, of the General Liquidation of the Public Debt, without having been able to obtain any decision whatever.

I therefore take the liberty, sir, to recommend the subject to your consideration, at the same time requesting that the Minister of Exterior Relations be reminded thereof. The object is to admit that the Rover comes within the case provided for by the convention, and to empower the Council of Liquidation to regulate in consequence the amount of the sum to which the owners are entitled.

I have the honor to be, with respect, sir, your most obedient servant,

FULWAR SKIPWITH.

Mr. Livingston to Mr. Skipwith, United States Consul General at Paris, dated Paris, June 25, 1804.

SIR: I return you the papers in the case of the Rover. Our Government supposes that, as to all prizes taken by privateers fitted out of Spanish ports and sold in such ports, they have a just claim upon Spain, and they have denied, as the Spanish Court insist, that we have made any demand upon France for such prizes, and have written to know whether their opinion on this head is correct. I cannot, therefore, knowing their sentiments on this subject, weaken their claim upon Spain by any application that may strengthen the pretensions of that Court to exonerate themselves.

I am, sir, your most obedient, humble servant,

ROB. R. LIVINGSTON.

Mr. Skipwith, Consul General of the United States at Paris, to Mr. Livingston, dated Paris, June 28, 1804.

SIR: I beg leave to observe, in reply to your letter of the 25th instant, returning the papers in the case of the Rover, that at present I am apprehensive no claim for that vessel can be maintained against the Spanish Government, because, if I do not mistake the late treaty with that Power, it leaves open all cases so situated for future discussion; but between France and the United States there does exist a convention in which there is no exclusion of cases situated as the Rover. Under the late convention there may be a claim for this vessel; there has been already a considerable claim in the case of the Barbara, submitted by authority of this Government to their and the American Commissioners for liquidation. It is, therefore, relinquishing a chance almost certain to prevent the case of the Rover coming before our Board of Commissioners, and embracing the very precarious one of future negotiations between the United States and Spain, in respect to property captured by French armed vessels and condemned in the ports of his Catholic Majesty.

I have the honor to be, respectfully, sir, your most obedient servant,

FULWAR SKIPWITH.

No. 544.

Mr. Skipwith, Commercial Agent of the United States at Paris, to the Secretary of State of the United States, dated Paris, July 18, 1804.

[Extract.]

"The enclosed copies of correspondence between our minister and myself, respecting the American vessels captured by French privateers and condemned in the different ports of Spain, I deem of sufficient importance to communicate, though I presume the minister himself will not fail to make you fully acquainted with the subject upon which it treats. With this correspondence you also have an authentic list of those captures, of the privateers that captured them, and likewise the names of the ports, as far as they could be obtained at the Council of Prizes, in which those privateers had been fitted out.

"Altogether ignorant as I have been, until the date of our minister's letter of the 25th ultimo, of our Government intending to seek redress from that of Spain on the ground of those condemnations, and observing that the principle of indemnification was not positively provided for in our late treaty with that country, I was induced, in the instance of the vessel called the Rover, to lay an appeal before the Council of Prizes, upon which a judgment in favor of both vessel and cargo has since been granted, and I have to add, has very lately been submitted by authority of this Government to their and the American commission for liquidation. In making this appeal it never once occurred to me that I might be acting contrary to the wishes of the President, and especially since our minister had never afforded me the slightest intimation to that purport; still this appeal was not entered until the Council had received a great number of others, and rendered judgments in favor of several, as is proven by the list here enclosed. I have communicated the minister's letters to me on this subject to our Board, who have already the cases of the Rover and the Barbara before them; whether they will consider themselves at liberty to withhold their decisions on those cases, I am not able to say."

[Extract.]

"If my memory does not deceive me, you observed some days ago, in the course of conversation on the subject of my letter of the 13th ultimo, making known the necessity of my being supplied with a certain amount of money to enable me to institute judicial proceedings on thirty-five cases of capture or depredation on American vessels, that you would be disposed to make such an advance for account of the United States, provided it had been ever done here or elsewhere by our Government. I cannot say that any such advance has been made by any minister of the United States in Paris. Indeed, I recollect on a similar application some years ago to Messrs. Pinckney, Marshall, and Gerry, then Envoys Extraordinary from the United States, they declined making the advance, on the ground that, considering the rupture and probability of a war between France and America, the following up of those prize causes appeared to them unnecessary and inexpedient."

[Extract.]

"I have it in my power at last to inform you of the producing before the Council of Prizes of such of the American cases as required our most immediate attention. Enclosed I have the honor of sending you a detailed statement of the same, to the number of sixteen. The whole of which, the Ganges excepted, are for captures posterior to the convention of 1800, and even some have been made after that of 1803; no doubt therefore but a favorable issue may be expected for the whole of them.

"Among the number of those remaining with me, respecting which I have already reported to Mr. Skipwith and yourself, there are some that require and shall obtain my early attention. Besides the above sixteen cases of a nature to be laid before the Council of Prizes, there were three which have been submitted to the Department they respectively belonged; they are the following, viz:

"1st. In the case of the Rover, Patton master, I have written a memorial in the two languages, the object of which was to show that said vessel and her cargo having been restored by the Council of Prizes on the 17th Brumaire, 10th year, and the captors having proved insolvent, said case was embraced by the convention of 1803. My memorial having been delivered to Mr. Skipwith, by whom the same was signed and presented, I am ignorant of the issue, and must suppose the case to be now under your valuable care and direction.

"2d. The schooner Thereza, Williamson master, owned by Champayne and Deyme, of Baltimore. This vessel was captured by a national sloop-of-war, and condemned at Guadaloupe on the 22d Prairial, 3d year. An appeal having been entered by the captured, the Tribunal Civil of Bassaterre, by their decree of the 22d Ventose, 9th year, have reversed the condemnation and awarded a full restitution which, as the capture was made by a national vessel, must be effected by Government. This case was, from its nature, entitled to the benefit of the Louisiana treaty, but the papers having been received at too late a period, I could see no way of redress but by an application to the Marine Minister, and through him to the French liquidation. I accordingly drew up a memorial, which Mr. Skipwith presented on the 23d of March last, and as this important case must require your attention and inquiries at the marine, I enclose my Cronillon of said memorial for your information, with a tender of my further services in case they should be wanted.

"3d. Ship Krow-Princen, owned by Robert Montgomery, Esq., Consul United States at Alicant. The condemnation in this case having been reversed by the Council of Prizes in the year 1801, and the captors having proved insolvent, I, in Mr. Skipwith's name, as attorney to the captured, drew up a memorial to the liquidation, in order to show that the case was embraced by the convention; I am ignorant of the issue, as the case has continued under Mr. Skipwith's direction. I leave some papers remaining with me; as to my rough draught of the memorial, it must have remained with Mr. Skipwith.

"The sixteen cases produced to the Council of Prizes being under my immediate direction until a decision takes place, I keep the rough draught of my memorials, of which, should the enclosed statement not be sufficient, you may have communication at any time."

19TH CONGRESS.] No. 438. [2D SESSION.

MESSAGE OF THE PRESIDENT AT THE COMMENCEMENT OF THE SESSION.—DOCUMENTS RELATING TO THE COLONIAL TRADE WITH GREAT BRITAIN.—RELATING TO AFFAIRS WITH BRAZIL.

COMMUNICATED TO CONGRESS DECEMBER 5, 1826.

Fellow-citizens of the Senate and of the House of Representatives of the United States:

The assemblage of the Representatives of our Union in both houses of Congress, at this time, occurs under circumstances calling for the renewed homage of our grateful acknowledgments to the Giver of all Good. With the exceptions incidental to the most felicitous condition of human existence, we continue to be highly favored in all the elements which contribute to individual comfort and to national prosperity. In the survey of our extensive country, we have generally to observe abodes of health and regions of plenty. In our civil and political relations, we have peace without and tranquillity within our borders. We are, as a people, increasing with unabated rapidity in population, wealth, and national resources; and whatever differences of opinion exist among us with regard to the mode and the means by which we shall turn the beneficence of Heaven to the improvement of our own condition, there is yet a spirit animating us all which will not suffer the bounties of Providence to be showered upon us in vain, but will receive them with grateful hearts and apply them with unwearied hands to the advancement of the general good.

Of the subjects recommended to Congress at their last session, some were then definitely acted upon. Others, left unfinished but partly matured, will recur to your attention, without needing a renewal of notice from me. The purpose of this communication will be to present to your view the general aspect of our public affairs at this moment, and the measures which have been taken to carry into effect the intentions of the Legislature as signified by the laws then and heretofore enacted.

In our intercourse with the other nations of the earth, we have still the happiness of enjoying peace and a general good understanding; qualified, however, in several important instances, by collisions of interest and by unsatisfied claims of justice, to the settlement of which the constitutional interposition of the legislative authority may become ultimately indispensable.

By the decease of the Emperor Alexander of Russia, which occurred contemporaneously with the commencement of the last session of Congress, the United States have been deprived of a long-tried, steady, and faithful friend. Born to the inheritance of absolute power, and trained in the school of adversity, from which no power on earth, however absolute, is exempt, that monarch from his youth had been taught to feel the force and value of public opinion, and to be sensible that the interest of his own Government would best be promoted by a frank and friendly intercourse with this Republic, as those of his people would be advanced by a liberal commercial intercourse with our country. A candid and confidential interchange of sentiments between him and the Government of the United States, upon the affairs of Southern America, took place at a period not long preceding his demise, and contributed to fix that course of policy which left to the other Governments of Europe no alternative but that of sooner or later recognizing the independence of our southern neighbors, of which the example had, by the United States, already been set. The ordinary diplomatic communications between his successor, the Emporer Nicholas, and the United States, have suffered some interruption by the illness, departure, and subsequent decease of his minister residing here, who enjoyed, as he merited, the entire confidence of his new sovereign, as he had eminently responded to that of his predecessor. But we have had the most satisfactory assurances that the sentiments of the reigning Emperor towards the United States are altogether conformable to those which had so long and so constantly animated his imperial brother; and we have reason to hope that they will serve to cement that harmony and good understanding between the two nations, which, founded in congenial interests, cannot but result in the advancement of the welfare and prosperity of both.

Our relations of commerce and navigation with France are, by the operation of the convention of June 24, 1822, with that nation, in a state of gradual and progressive improvement. Convinced by all our experience, no less than by the principles of fair and liberal reciprocity, which the United States have constantly tendered to all the nations of the earth, as the rule of commercial intercourse which they would universally prefer, that fair and equal competition is most conducive to the interests of both parties, the United States, in the negotiation of that convention, earnestly contended for a mutual renunciation of discriminating duties and charges in the ports of the two countries. Unable to obtain the immediate recognition of this principle in its full extent, after reducing the duties of discrimination so far as it was found attainable, it was agreed that at the expiration of two years from the 1st of October, 1822, when the convention was to go into effect, unless a notice of six months on either side should be given to the other that the convention itself must terminate, those duties should be reduced one-fourth; and that this reduction should be yearly repeated until all discrimination should cease while the convention itself should continue in force. By the effect of this stipulation three-fourths of the discriminating duties which had been levied by each party upon the vessels of the other in its ports have already been removed; and, on the 1st of next October, should the convention be still in force, the remaining fourth will be discontinued. French vessels laden with French produce will be received in our ports on the same terms as our own; and ours, in return, will enjoy the same advantages in the ports of France. By these approximations to an equality of duties and of charges, not only has the commerce between the two countries prospered, but friendly dispositions have been, on both sides, encouraged and promoted. They will continue to be cherished and cultivated on the part of the United States. It would have been gratifying to have had it in my power to add, that the claims upon the justice of the French Government, involving the property and the comfortable subsistence of many of our fellow-citizens, and which have been so long and so earnestly urged, were in a more promising train of adjustment than at your last meeting; but their condition remains unaltered.

With the Government of the Netherlands the mutual abandonment of discriminating duties had been regulated by legislative acts on both sides. The acts of Congress of the 20th of April, 1818, abolished all discriminating duties of impost and tonnage upon the vessels and produce of the Netherlands in the ports of the United States, upon the assurance given by the Government of the Netherlands that all such duties operating against the shipping and commerce of the United States in that Kingdom had been abolished. These reciprocal regulations had continued in force several years, when the discriminating principle was resumed by the Netherlands in a new and indirect form, by a bounty of ten per cent. in the shape of a return of duties to their national vessels, and in which those of the United States are not permitted to participate. By the act of Congress of 7th January, 1824, all discriminating duties in the United States were again suspended, so far as related to the vessels and produce of the Netherlands, so long as the reciprocal exemption should be extended to the vessels and produce of the United States in the Netherlands. But the same act provides that, in the event of a restoration of discriminating duties to operate against the shipping and commerce of the United States in any of the foreign countries referred to therein, the suspension of discriminating duties in favor of the navigation of such foreign country should cease, and all the provisions of the acts imposing discriminating foreign tonnage and impost duties in the United States should revive and be in full force with regard to that nation.

In the correspondence with the Government of the Netherlands upon this subject, they have contended that the favor shown to their own shipping by this bounty upon their tonnage is not to be considered as a discriminating duty. But it cannot be denied that it produces all the same effects. Had the mutual abolition been stipulated by treaty, such a bounty upon the national vessels could scarcely have been granted consistently with good faith. Yet, as the act of Congress of 7th January, 1824, has not expressly authorized the Executive authority to determine what shall be considered as a revival of discriminating duties by a foreign Government to the disadvantage of the United States, and as the retaliatory measure on our part, however just and necessary, may tend rather to that conflict of legislation which we deprecate than to that concert to which we invite all commercial nations as most conducive to their interest and our own, I have thought it more consistent with the spirit of our institutions to refer the subject again to the paramount authority of the Legislature to decide what measure the emergency may require, than abruptly, by proclamation, to carry into effect the minatory provisions of the act of 1824.

During the last session of Congress treaties of amity, navigation, and commerce, were negotiated and signed at this place with the Government of Denmark, (in Europe,) and with the Federation of Central America, (in this hemisphere.) These treaties then received the constitutional sanction of the Senate by the advice and consent to their ratification. They were accordingly ratified on the part of the United States, and, during the recess of Congress, have been also ratified by the other respective contracting parties. The ratifications have been exchanged, and they have been published by proclamations, copies of which are herewith communicated to Congress. These treaties have established between the contracting parties the principles of equality and reciprocity in their broadest and most liberal extent. Each party admitting the vessels of the other into its ports, laden with cargoes the produce or manufacture of any quarter of the globe, upon the payment of the same duties of tonnage and impost that are chargeable upon their own. They have further stipulated that the parties shall hereafter grant no favor of navigation or commerce to any other nation which shall not, upon the same terms, be granted to each other; and that neither party will impose upon articles of merchandise, the produce or manufature of the other, any other or higher duties than upon the like articles, being the produce or manufacture of any other country. To these principles there is, in the convention with Denmark, an exception with regard to the colonies of that Kingdom in the Arctic Seas, but none with regard to her colonies in the West Indies.

In the course of the last summer, the term to which our last commercial treaty with Sweden was limited has expired. A continuation of it is in the contemplation of the Swedish Government, and is believed to be desirable on the part of the United States. It has been proposed by the King of Sweden that, pending the negotiation of renewal, the expired treaty should be mutually considered as still in force; a measure which will require the sanction of Congress to be carried into effect on our part, and which I therefore recommend to your consideration.

With Prussia, Spain, Portugal, and in general all the European Powers, between whom and the United States relations of friendly intercourse have existed, their condition has not materially varied since the last session of Congress. I regret not to be able to say the same of our commercial intercourse with the colonial possessions of Great Britain in America. Negotiations of the highest importance to our common interests have been for several years in discussion between the two Governments, and on the part of the United States have been invariably pursued in the spirit of candor and conciliation. Interests of great magnitude and delicacy had been adjusted by the conventions of 1815 and 1818, while that of 1822, mediated by the late Emperor Alexander, had promised a satisfactory compromise of claims which the Government of the United States, in justice to the rights of a numerous class of their citizens, was bound to sustain. But, with regard to the commercial intercourse between the United States and the British colonies in America, it has been hitherto found impracticable to bring the parties to an understanding satisfactory to both. The relative geographical position and the respective products of nature cultivated by human industry had constituted the elements of a commercial intercourse between the United States and British America, insular and continental, important to the inhabitants of both countries. But it had been interdicted by Great Britain, upon a principle heretofore practiced upon by the colonizing nations of Europe, of holding the trade of their colonies, each in exclusive monopoly to herself. After the termination of the late war this interdiction had been revived, and the British Government declined including this portion of our intercourse with her possessions in the negotiation of the convention of 1815. The trade was then carried on exclusively in British vessels, till the act of Congress concerning navigation of 1818, and the supplemental act of 1820, met the interdict by a corresponding measure on the part of the United States. These measures, not of retaliation but of necessary self-defence, were soon succeeded by an act of Parliament opening certain colonial ports to the vessels of the United States, coming directly from them, and to the importation from them of certain articles of our produce, burdened with heavy duties, and excluding some of the most valuable articles of our exports. The United States opened their ports to British vessels from the colonies upon terms as exactly corresponding with those of the act of Parliament as, in the relative position of the parties, could be made. And a negotiation was commenced by mutual consent with the hope, on our part, that a reciprocal spirit of accommodation and a common sentiment of the importance of the trade to the interests of the two countries, between whom it must be carried on, would ultimately bring the parties to a compromise, with which both might be satisfied. With this view, the Government of the United States had determined to sacrifice something of that entire reciprocity which in all commercial arrangements with foreign powers they are entitled to demand, and to acquiesce in some inequalities disadvantageous to ourselves, rather than to forego the benefit of a final and permanent adjustment of this interest to the satisfaction of Great Britain herself. The negotiation, repeatedly suspended by accidental circumstances, was, however, by mutual agreement and express assent, considered as pending, and to be speedily resumed. In the meantime another act of Parliament, so doubtful and ambiguous in its import as to have been misunderstood by the officers in the colonies who were to carry it into execution, opens again certain colonial ports upon new conditions and terms, with a threat to close them against any nation which may not accept those terms as prescribed by the British Government. This act, passed in July, 1825, not communicated to the Government of the United States, not understood by the British officers of the customs in the colonies where it was to be enforced, was nevertheless submitted to the consideration of Congress at their last session. With the knowledge that a negotiation upon the subject had long been in progress, and pledges given of its resumption at an early day, it was deemed expedient to await the result of that negotiation, rather than to subscribe implicitly to terms the import of which was not clear, and which the British authorities themselves, in this hemisphere, were not prepared to explain.

Immediately after the close of the last session of Congress, one of our most distinguished citizens was despatched as Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary to Great Britain, furnished with instructions which we could not doubt would lead to a conclusion of this long controverted interest upon terms acceptable to Great Britain. Upon his arrival, and before he had delivered his letters of credence, he was met by an order of the British Council, excluding, from and after the first of December now current, the vessels of the United States from all the colonial British ports, excepting those immediately bordering upon our Territories. In answer to his expostulations upon a measure thus unexpected, he is informed that, according to the ancient maxims of policy of European nations having colonies, their trade is an exclusive possession of the mother country. That all participation in it by other nations is a boon or favor, not forming a subject of negotiation, but to be regulated by the legislative acts of the power owning the colony. That the British Government, therefore, declines negotiating concerning it; and that, as the United States did not forthwith accept purely and simply the terms offered by the act of Parliament of July, 1825, Great Britain would not now admit the vessels of the United States, even upon the terms on which she has opened them to the navigation of other nations. We have been accustomed to consider the trade which we have enjoyed with the British colonies rather as an interchange of mutual benefits than as a mere favor received; that, under every circumstance, we have given an ample equivalent. We have seen every other nation holding colonies negotiate with other nations, and grant them, freely, admission to the colonies by treaty; and, so far are the other colonizing nations of Europe now from refusing to negotiate for trade with their colonies, that we ourselves have secured access to the colonies of more than one of them by treaty. The refusal, however, of Great Britain to negotiate, leaves to the United States no other alternative than that of regulating or interdicting altogether the trade on their part, according as either measure may affect the interests of our own country; and, with that exclusive object, I would recommend the whole subject to your calm and candid deliberations.

It is hoped that our unavailing exertions to accomplish a cordial good understanding on this interest will not have an unpropitious effect upon the other great topics of discussion between the two Governments. Our Northeastern and Northwestern boundaries are still unadjusted. The Commissioners, under the seventh article of the treaty of Ghent, have nearly come to the close of their labors; nor can we renounce the expectation, enfeebled as it is, that they may agree upon their report to the satisfaction or acquiescence of both parties. The commission for liquidating the claims for indemnities for slaves carried away after the close of the war has been sitting with doubtful prospects of success. Propositions of compromise have, however, passed between the two Governments, the result of which, we flatter ourselves, may yet prove satisfactory. Our own disposition and purposes toward Great Britain are all friendly and conciliatory; nor can we abandon but with strong reluctance the belief that they will, ultimately, meet a return, not of favors, which we neither ask nor desire, but of equal reciprocity and good will.

With the American Governments of this hemisphere we continue to maintain an intercourse altogether friendly, and between their nations and ours that commercial interchange, of which mutual benefit is the source and mutual comfort and harmony the result, is in a continual state of improvement. The war between Spain and them, since the total expulsion of the Spanish military force from the continental territories, has been little more than nominal; and their internal tranquillity, though occasionally menaced by the agitations which civil wars never fail to leave behind them, has not been affected by any serious calamity.

The Congress of ministers from several of those nations which assembled at Panama, after a short session there, adjourned to meet again, at a more favorable season, in the neighborhood of Mexico. The decease of one of our ministers on his way to the Isthmus, and the impediments of the season which delayed the departure of the other, deprived us of the advantage of being represented at the first meeting of the Congress. There is, however, no reason to believe that any of the transactions of the Congress were of a nature to affect injuriously the interests of the United States, or to require the interposition of our ministers had they been present. Their absence has, indeed, deprived us of the opportunity of possessing precise and authentic information of the treaties which were concluded at Panama, and the whole result has confirmed me in the conviction of the expediency to the United States of being represented at the Congress. The surviving member of the mission, appointed during your last session, has accordingly proceeded to his destination, and a successor to his distinguished and lamented associate will be nominated to the Senate. A treaty of amity, navigation, and commerce has, in the course of the last summer, been concluded by our minister plenipotentiary at Mexico with the United States of that confederacy, which will also be laid before the Senate for their advice with regard to its ratification.

In adverting to the present condition of our fiscal concerns and to the prospects of our revenue, the first remark that calls our attention is that they are less exuberantly prosperous than they were at the corresponding period of the last year. The severe shock so extensively sustained by the commercial and manufacturing interests in Great Britain has not been without a perceptible recoil upon ourselves. A reduced importation from abroad is necessarily succeeded by a reduced return to the Treasury at home. The net revenue of the present year will not equal that of the last, and the receipts of that which is to come will fall short of those in the current year. The diminution, however, is in part attributable to the flourishing condition of some of our domestic manufactures, and so far is compensated by an equivalent more profitable to the nation. It is also highly gratifying to perceive that the deficiency in the revenue, while it scarcely exceeds the anticipations of the last year's estimates from the Treasury, has not interrupted the application of more than eleven millions during the present year to the discharge of the principal and interest of the debt, nor the reduction of upwards of seven millions of the capital of the debt itself. The balance in the Treasury on the 1st of January last was five millions two hundred and one thousand six hundred and fifty dollars and forty-three cents. The receipts from that time to the 30th of September last were nineteen millions five hundred and eighty-five thousand nine hundred and thirty-two dollars and fifty cents. The receipts of the current quarter, estimated at six millions of dollars, yield, with the sums already received, a revenue of about twenty-five millions and a half for the year. The expenditures for the three first quarters of the year have amounted to eighteen millions seven hundred and fourteen thousand two hundred and twenty-six dollars and sixty-six cents. The expenditures of the current quarter are expected, including the two millions of the principal of the debt to be paid, to balance the receipts. So that the expenses of the year, amounting to upwards of a million less than its income, will leave a proportionally increased balance in the Treasury on the 1st of January, 1827, over that of the 1st of January last. Instead of five millions two hundred thousand there will be six millions four hundred thousand dollars.

The amount of duties secured on merchandise imported from the commencement of the year till the 30th of September is estimated at twenty-one millions two hundred and fifty thousand dollars, and the amount that will probably accrue during the present quarter is estimated at four millions two hundred and fifty thousand, making for the whole year twenty-five millions and a half, from which the drawbacks being deducted will leave a clear revenue from the customs, receivable in the year 1827, of about twenty millions four hundred thousand dollars, which, with the sums to be received from the proceeds of public lands, the bank dividends, and other incidental receipts, will form an aggregate of about twenty-three millions—a sum falling short of the whole expenses of the present year little more than the portion of those expenditures applied to the discharge of the public debt beyond the annual appropriation of ten millions by the act of March 3, 1817. At the passage of that act the public debt amounted to one hundred and twenty-three millions and a half. On the first of January next it will be short of seventy-four millions. In the lapse of these ten years fifty millions of public debt, with the annual charge of upwards of three millions of interest upon them, have been extinguished. At the passage of that act of the annual appropriation of ten millions, seven were absorbed in the payment of interest, and not more than three millions went to reduce the capital of the debt. Of the same ten millions at this time scarcely four are applicable to the interest, and upwards of six are effective in melting down the capital. Yet our experience has proved that a revenue consisting so largely of imposts and tonnage ebbs and flows to an extraordinary extent with all the fluctuations incident to the general commerce of the world. It is within our recollection that, even in the compass of the same last ten years, the receipts of the Treasury were not adequate to the expenditures of the year, and that in two successive years it was found necessary to resort to loans to meet the engagements of the nation. The returning tides of the succeeding years replenished the public coffers until they have again begun to feel the vicissitude of a decline. To produce these alternations of fullness and exhaustion, the relative operation of abundant or unfruitful seasons, the regulations of foreign Governments, political revolutions, the prosperous or decaying condition of manufactures, commercial speculations, and many other causes not always to be traced, variously combine. We have found the alternate swells and diminutions embracing periods of from two to three years. The last period of depression to us was from 1819 to 1822. The corresponding revival was from 1823 to the commencement of the present year. Still we have no cause to apprehend a depression comparable to that of the former period, or even to anticipate a deficiency which will intrench upon the ability to apply the annual ten millions to the reduction of the debt. It is well for us, however, to be admonished of the necessity of abiding by the maxims of the most vigilant economy, and of resorting to all honorable and useful expedients for pursuing with steady and inflexible perseverance the total discharge of the debt.

Besides the seven millions of the loans of 1813, which will have been discharged in the course of the present year, there are nine millions which, by the terms of the contracts, would have been and are now redeemable. Thirteen millions more of the loan of 1814 will become redeemable from and after the expiration of the present month; and nine other millions from and after the close of the ensuing year. They constitute a mass of thirty-one millions of dollars, all bearing an interest of six per cent., more than twenty millions of which will be immediately redeemable, and the rest within a little more than a year. Leaving of this amount fifteen millions to continue at the interest of six per cent., but to be paid off, as far as shall be found practicable, in the years 1827 and 1828, there is scarcely a doubt that the remaining sixteen millions might, within a few months, be discharged by a loan at not exceeding five per cent., redeemable in the years 1829 and 1830. By this operation a sum of nearly half a million of dollars may be saved to the nation, and the discharge of the whole thirty-one millions within the four years may be greatly facilitated, if not wholly accomplished.

By an act of Congress of March 3, 1825, a loan for the purpose now referred to, or a subscription to stock, was authorized, at an interest not exceeding four and a half per cent. But at that time so large a portion of the floating capital of the country was absorbed in commercial speculations, and so little was left for investment in the stocks, that the measure was but partially successful. At the last session of Congress, the condition of the funds was still unpropitious to the measure; but the change so soon afterwards occurred that, had the authority existed to redeem the nine millions now redeemable by an exchange of stocks or a loan at five per cent., it is morally certain that it might have been effected, and with it a yearly saving of ninety thousand dollars.

With regard to the collection of the revenue of imposts, certain occurrences have, within the last year, been disclosed in one or two of our principal ports, which engaged the attention of Congress at their last session, and may hereafter require further consideration. Until within a very few years, the execution of the laws for raising the revenue, like that of all our other laws, has been insured more by the moral sense of the community than by the rigors of a jealous precaution or by penal sanctions. Confiding in the exemplary punctuality and unsullied integrity of our importing merchants, a gradual relaxation from the provisions of the collection laws, a close adherence to which would have caused inconvenience and expense to them, had long become habitual; and indulgences had been extended universally, because they had never been abused. It may be worthy of your serious consideration whether some further legislative provision may not be necessary to come in aid of this state of unguarded security.

From the reports, herewith communicated, of the Secretaries of War and of the Navy, with the subsidiary documents annexed to them, will be discovered the present condition and administration of our military establishment on the land and on the sea. The organization of the Army having undergone no change since its reduction to the present Peace Establishment in 1821, it remains only to observe that it is yet found adequate to all the purposes for which a permanent armed force in time of peace can be needed or useful. It may be proper to add that from a difference of opinion between the late President of the United States and the Senate, with regard to the construction of the act of Congress of March 2, 1821, to reduce and fix the Military Peace Establishment of the United States, it remains hitherto so far without execution that no Colonel has been appointed to command one of the regiments of artillery. A supplementary or explanatory act of the Legislature appears to be the only expedient practicable for removing the difficulty of this appointment.

In a period of profound peace, the conduct of the mere military establishment forms but a very inconsiderable portion of the duties devolving upon the administration of the Department of War. It will be seen by the returns from the subordinate departments of the Army that every branch of the service is marked with order, regularity, and discipline. That, from the Commanding General through all the gradations of superintendence, the officers feel themselves to have been citizens before they were soldiers, and that the glory of a Republican Army must consist in the spirit of freedom by which it is animated, and of patriotism by which it is impelled. It may be confidently stated that the moral character of the Army is in a state of continual improvement, and that all the arrangements for the disposal of its parts have a constant reference to that end.

But to the War Department are attributed other duties, having, indeed, relation to a future possible condition of war, but being purely defensive, and in their tendency contributing rather to the security and permanency of peace; the erection of the fortifications provided for by Congress and adapted to secure our shores from hostile invasion; the distribution of the fund of public gratitude and justice to the pensioners of the Revolutionary war; the maintenance of our relations of peace and of protection with the Indian tribes; and the internal improvements and surveys for the location of roads and canals, which, during the last three sessions of Congress, have engaged so much of their attention, and may engross so large a share of their future benefactions to our country.

By the act of the 30th of April, 1824, suggested and approved by my predecessor, the sum of thirty thousand dollars was appropriated for the purpose of causing to be made the necessary surveys, plans, and estimates of the routes of such roads and canals as the President of the United States might deem of national importance in a commercial or military point of view, or necessary for the transportation of the public mail; the surveys, plans, and estimates for each, when completed, to be laid before Congress.

In execution of this act, a Board of Engineers was immediately instituted, and have been since most assiduously and constantly occupied in carrying it into effect. The first object to which their labors were directed, by order of the late President, was the examination of the country between the tide waters of the Potomac, the Ohio, and Lake Erie, to ascertain the practicability of a communication between them, to designate the most suitable route for the same, and to form plans and estimates, in detail, of the expense of execution.

On the 3d of February, 1825, they made their first report, which was immediately communicated to Congress, and in which they declared that, having maturely considered the circumstances observed by them personally, and carefully studied the results of such of the preliminary surveys as were then completed, they were decidedly of opinion that the communication was practicable.

At the last session of Congress, before the Board of Engineers were enabled to make up their second report, containing a general plan and preparatory estimates for the work, the Committee of the House of Representatives upon Roads and Canals closed the session with a report, expressing the hope that the plan and estimate of the Board of Engineers might at this time be prepared, and that the subject be referred to the early and favorable consideration of Congress at their present session. That expected report of the Board of Engineers is prepared and will forthwith be laid before you.

Under the resolution of Congress authorizing the Secretary of War to have prepared a complete system of cavalry tactics, and a system of exercise and instruction of field artillery for the use of the militia of the United States, to be reported to Congress at the present session, a Board of distinguished officers of the army and of the militia has been convened, whose report will be submitted to you with that of the Secretary of War. The occasion was thought favorable for consulting the same Board, aided by the results of a correspondence with the Governors of the several States and Territories, and other citizens of intelligence and experience, upon the acknowledged defective condition of our militia system, and of the improvements of which it is susceptible. The report of the Board upon this subject is also submitted for your consideration.

In the estimates of appropriations for the ensuing year upwards of five millions of dollars will be submitted for the expenditures to be paid from the Department of War. Less than two-fifths of this will be applicable to the support and maintenance of the Army. A million and a half, in the form of pensions, goes as a scarcely adequate tribute to the services and sacrifices of a former age; and a more than equal sum, invested in fortifications, or for the preparations of internal improvement, provides for the quiet, the comfort, and happier existence of the ages to come. The appropriations to indemnify those unfortunate remnants of another race, unable alike to share in the enjoyments and to exist in the presence of civilization, though swelling in recent years to a magnitude burdensome to the Treasury, are generally not without their equivalents in profitable value; or serve to discharge the Union from engagements more burdensome than debt.

In like manner the estimate of appropriations for the Navy Department will present an aggregate sum of upwards of three millions of dollars. About one-half of these, however, cover the current expenditures of the Navy in actual service, and one-half constitutes a fund of national property, the pledge of our future glory and defence. It was scarcely one short year after the close of the late war, and when the burden of its expenses and charges was weighing heaviest upon the country, that Congress, by the act of April 29, 1816, appropriated one million of dollars annually, for eight years, to the gradual increase of the Navy. At a subsequent period this annual appropriation was reduced to a half a million for six years, of which the present year is the last. A yet more recent appropriation, the last two years, for building ten sloops-of-war has nearly restored the original appropriation of 1816, of a million for every year. The result is before us all. We have twelve line-of-battle-ships, twenty frigates, and sloops-of-war in proportion, which, with a few months of preparation, may present a line of floating fortifications along the whole range of our coast, ready to meet any invader who might attempt to set foot upon our shores. Combining with a system of fortifications upon the shores themselves, commenced about the same time, under the auspices of my immediate predecessor, and hitherto systematically pursued, it has placed in our possession the most effective sinews of war, and has left us at once an example and a lesson from which our own duties may be inferred. The gradual increase of the Navy was the principle of which the act of April 29, 1816, was the first development. It was the introduction of a system to act upon the character and history of our country for an indefinite series of ages. It was a declaration of that Congress to their constituents and to posterity that it was the destiny and the duty of these confederated States to become, in regular process of time, and by no petty advances, a great naval power. That which they proposed to accomplish in eight years is rather to be considered as the measure of their means than the limitation of their design. They looked forward for a term of years sufficient for the accomplishment of a definite portion of their purpose, and they left to their successors to fill up the canvass of which they had traced the large and prophetic outline. The ships-of-the-line and frigates which they had in contemplation will be shortly completed. The time which they had allotted for the accomplishment of the work has more than elapsed. It remains for your consideration how their successors may contribute their portion of toil and of treasure for the benefit of the succeeding age, in the gradual increase of our Navy. There is, perhaps, no part of the exercise of the constitutional powers of the Federal Government which has given more general satisfaction to the people of the Union than this. The system has not been thus vigorously introduced, and hitherto sustained, to be now departed from or abandoned. In continuing to provide for the gradual increase of the Navy, it may not be necessary or expedient to add for the present any more to the number of our ships; but should you deem it advisable to continue the yearly appropriation of half a million to the same objects, it may be profitably expended in providing a supply of timber to be seasoned, and other materials for future use; in the construction of docks, or in laying the foundations of a school for naval education, as to the wisdom of Congress either of those measures may appear to claim the preference.

Of the small portions of this Navy engaged in actual service during the peace, squadrons have continued to be maintained in the Pacific Ocean, in the West India seas, and in the Mediterranean, to which has been added a small armament to cruise on the eastern coast of South America. In all they have afforded protection to our commerce, have contributed to make our country advantageously known to foreign nations, have honorably employed multitudes of our seamen in the service of their country, and have inured numbers of youths of the rising generation to lives of manly hardihood, of nautical experience, and skill. The piracies with which the West India seas were for several years infested have been totally suppressed; but in the Mediterranean they have increased in a manner afflictive to other nations, and, but for the continued presence of our squadron, would probably have been distressing to our own. The war which has unfortunately broken out between the Republic of Buenos Ayres and the Brazilian Government has given rise to very great irregularities among the naval officers of the latter, by whom principles in relation to blockades and to neutral navigation have been brought forward to which we cannot subscribe, and which our own commanders have found it necessary to resist. From the friendly disposition towards the United States constantly manifested by the Emperor of Brazil, and the very useful and friendly commercial intercourse between the United States and his dominions, we have reason to believe that the just reparation demanded for the injuries sustained by several of our citizens from some of his officers will not be withheld. Abstracts from the recent despatches of the commanders of our several squadrons are communicated with the report of the Secretary of the Navy to Congress.

A report from the Postmaster General is likewise communicated, presenting in a highly satisfactory manner the result of a vigorous, efficient, and economical administration of that Department. The revenue of the office, even of the year including the latter half of 1824 and the first half of 1825, had exceeded its expenditures by a sum of more than forty-five thousand dollars. That of the succeeding year has been still more productive. The increase of the receipts in the year preceding the first of July last over that of the year before exceeds one hundred and thirty-six thousand dollars, and the excess of the receipts over the expenditures of the year has swollen from forty-five thousand to nearly eighty thousand dollars. During the same period contracts for additional transportation of the mail in stages for about two hundred and sixty thousand miles have been made, and for seventy thousand miles annually on horseback. Seven hundred and fourteen new post offices have been established within the year, and the increase of revenue within the last three years, as well as the augmentation of the transportation by mail, is more than equal to the whole amount of receipts and of mail conveyance at the commencement of the present century, when the seat of the General Government was removed to this place. When we reflect that the objects effected by the transportation of the mail are among the choicest comforts and enjoyments of social life, it is pleasing to observe that the dissemination of them to every corner of our country has outstripped in their increase even the rapid march of our population.

By the treaties with France and Spain, respectively, ceding Louisiana and the Floridas to the United States, provision was made for the security of land titles derived from the Governments of those nations. Some progress has been made, under the authority of various acts of Congress, in the ascertainment and establishment of those titles; but claims to a very large extent remain unadjusted. The public faith, no less than the just rights of individuals and the interest of the community itself, appears to require further provision for the speedy settlement of those claims, which I therefore recommend to the care and attention of the Legislature.

In conformity with the provisions of the act of 20th May last, to provide for erecting a penitentiary in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes, three commissioners were appointed to select a site for the erection of a penitentiary for the District, and also a site in the county of Alexandria for a county jail, both of which objects have been effected. The building of the penitentiary has been commenced, and is in such a degree of forwardness as to promise that it will be completed before the meeting of the next Congress. This consideration points to the expediency of maturing at the present session a system for the regulation and government of the penitentiary, and of defining the class of offences which shall be punishable by confinement in this edifice.

In closing this communication I trust that it will not be deemed inappropriate to the occasion and purposes upon which we are here assembled to indulge in a momentary retrospect, combining in a single glance the period of our origin as a national confederation with that of our present existence, at the precise interval of half a century from each other. Since your last meeting at this place the fiftieth anniversary of the day when our independence was declared has been celebrated throughout our land; and on that day, while every heart was bounding with joy and every voice was tuned to gratulation, amid the blessings of freedom and independence which the sires of a former age had handed down to their children, two of the principal actors in that solemn scene—the hand that penned the ever memorable declaration and the voice that sustained it in debate—were, by one summons, at the distance of seven hundred miles from each other, called before the Judge of all to account for their deeds done upon earth. They departed, cheered by the benedictions of their country, to whom they left the inheritance of their fame and the memory of their bright example. If we turn our thoughts to the condition of their country, in the contrast of the first and last day of that half century, how resplendent and sublime is the transition from gloom to glory. Then, glancing through the same lapse of time, in the condition of the individuals, we see the first day marked with the fullness and vigor of youth, in the pledge of their lives, their fortunes, and their sacred honor to the cause of freedom and of mankind; and on the last, extended on the bed of death, with but sense and sensibility left to breathe a last aspiration to Heaven of blessing upon their country, may we not humbly hope that to them, too, it was a pledge of transition from gloom to glory, and that while their mortal vestments were sinking into the clod of the valley, their emancipated spirits were ascending to the bosom of their God.

WASHINGTON, October 25, 1822.

SIR: A letter addressed by the Comptroller of the United States Treasury to the Collectors and other officers of the customs, for the purpose, in part, of explaining under what modifications the President's proclamation, by which the ports of the United States have been declared open to British vessels arriving from his Majesty's colonies in North America and the West Indies, is to be understood as going into operation, has lately been pressed upon my notice by several of his Majesty's Consuls. The letter in question is dated the 14th of last month, and has since been printed in the public journals. On examining its contents I have found that it describes British vessels entering the harbors of the United States in virtue of the above mentioned proclamation, as liable to a duty of one dollar per ton for tonnage and light money, and their cargoes as liable to the discriminating duty of ten per cent., which is levied on goods imported in foreign vessels not privileged by treaty. I have also observed that, according to the tenor of the Comptroller's letter, the vessels of either country trading between the ports of the United States and such of his Majesty's colonies as the President's proclamation enumerates, are restricted, when coming from the West Indies, to the importation of articles the growth, produce, or manufacture of the West Indian colonies, and to the importation of articles the growth, produce, or manufacture of the North American colonies, in the case of such vessels having cleared out from any of the specified ports in that quarter. This restriction, and the extraordinary duties imposed upon British vessels and their cargoes, in pursuance of the Comptroller's letter, appear to my understanding so much at variance with the spirit and intention of the act of Parliament by which the newly opened trade is regulated, and to answer, indeed, so imperfectly to the leading principle set forth in the act of Congress on which the President's proclamation is grounded, that I esteem it an indispensable duty to anticipate the special instructions of my Government by soliciting your immediate attention to the subject.

In the act of Parliament, passed during the last session, entitled "An act to regulate the trade between his Majesty's possessions in America and the West Indies, and other places in America and the West Indies," it is expressly declared, as the intention and meaning of the act, that the privileges thereby granted to foreign ships and vessels shall be confined to the ships and vessels of such countries only as give the like privileges to British ships and vessels in their ports in America and the West Indies. It is essential, therefore, as far as this country is concerned, to ascertain, in the outset, that British ship owners are able, under the existing regulations, to engage in the new trade on a footing of fair competition with the American; and I think it will be no less evident to you, sir, than it is to me, that such can hardly be the case so long as British shipping is rendered liable to a tonnage duty higher, by 94 cents the ton, than that exacted from American vessels, and while the merchandise imported into the former is subject to a discriminating duty of ten per cent.

Any difference in the charges imposed in the ports of the United States on the vessels of the two countries, navigating, in other respects, under similar circumstances, must necessarily give an undue advantage to the favored party. The difference, in the present instance, if not counterbalanced by similar discriminating duties in the colonial ports, would probably have the effect of excluding British vessels from all participation in this branch of commerce. If colonial duties, of a similar nature, operating to the disadvantage of American shipping be already either in existence or in immediate contemplation, no such fact, and no such intention can, at least, be inferred from the provisions of the act of Parliament at present in force. The general tenor of the act may be regarded, on the contrary, as warranting a very different conclusion; and the eleventh and twelfth enactments, in particular, appear to have been framed with the view of securing to foreigners a fair and liberal participation in the British colonial trade, as far as it has been deemed advisable to open it. Such, indeed, is the care with which this object has, to all appearance, been provided for, that the condition of reciprocity, to which I have already adverted, and the power intrusted to the King in Council, of withdrawing the privileges offered by the act of Parliament from countries not giving the like privileges in return to British vessels, would seem to have become indispensable, as strict matter of justice, for the due protection of British navigation.

It is difficult to suppose that there can be any want of inclination on the part of the American Government to avail itself of the opening afforded by the above mentioned act of Parliament. To whatever degree the regulations specified in the Treasury circular may have the effect of embarrassing or interrupting the intercourse between this country and his Majesty's colonies in the West Indies and North America, the terms of the act of Congress eventually authorizing the President to open the ports of the United States to British vessels coming from those colonies bear evidence that the American Legislature, in passing the act of last session, had no restrictions in view but such as should appear to have a specific counterpart in the enactments of the British Parliament.

With respect to the other regulation, by which the vessels of either country, engaged in trading between the ports of the United States and his Majesty's colonies in North America and the West Indies, are restricted to the importation of articles the growth, produce, or manufacture, of the particular description of colonies from which, in each voyage, they have cleared out, the Comptroller represents in his letter as being meant to correspond to the following provision contained in the third section of the act of Parliament, namely, that no articles, enumerated in the schedule, shall be imported in any foreign ship or vessel, unless shipped and brought directly from the country or place of which they are the growth, produce, or manufacture.

Whatever may have been the intention with which this regulation was framed, it is evidently a mistake to describe it as corresponding to the above mentioned clause in the British act of Parliament. The fact is, that the range of the American restriction is beyond comparison more extensive than that of the British.

A few words will suffice to verify this assertion.

To open a commercial intercourse between the United States and certain of his Majesty's colonies in North America and the West Indies is an object common to the act of Congress, to the act of Parliament, and to the President's proclamation. The act of Parliament in providing, with respect to this country, that the vessels of the United States should be allowed to import into the said colonies no articles but what are "brought directly from the country or place of which they are the growth, produce, or manufacture," establishes no distinction whatever between one part of the United States and another. A vessel, for example, belonging to Boston, and clearing out for the colonies from that harbor, would be permitted, I conceive, under the provisions of the act, to import the tobacco of Virginia and the cotton of Louisiana no less than any other of the enumerated articles which happen to be the produce or manufacture of that immediate neighborhood. The American regulation, on the contrary, will not allow a British vessel, clearing out from Halifax, for instance, or from St. John's, though otherwise duly qualified, to import into the United States the produce or manufacture of the West Indies, nor will it admit of Canadian and other North American produce being imported in a British vessel when coming from a port of the West Indies, creating thereby a distinction which affects exclusively his Majesty's colonies, constituting, as they do in this instance, one of the two parties reciprocally concerned, and which, as a countervailing measure, has no real foundation in any provision of the act of Parliament.

The view which I have taken of this restriction is wholly independent of the practical inconvenience, if any, with which its operation may be attended. It is sufficient for the present to show that, in order to entitle it to the character of a corresponding regulation, the act of Parliament to which the Comptroller's letter refers should be proved to contain a provision establishing between the productions of the northern and southern parts of the United States, when imported into his Majesty's colonies, a similar distinction to that which the regulation contains with reference to the productions of those colonies.

The preceding remarks are presented to your consideration, sir, under a persuasion, derived from the public acts to which they refer, that the American Government will, itself, be anxious to lose no time in relieving the newly opened trade from any charge or restriction originating within its authority which is found not to answer in strict reciprocity to any existing enactment or regulation on the side of Great Britain.

I beg, sir, that you will accept the assurances of perfect consideration with which I have the honor to be, sir, your most obedient, humble servant,

STRATFORD CANNING.

Hon. JOHN QUINCY ADAMS, Secretary of State.

Mr. Adams to Mr. Canning.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, November 11, 1822.

SIR: Your letter of the 25th ultimo having been laid before the President of the United States, I am directed to assure you of the disposition of this Government to co-operate with that of Great Britain in every measure necessary for opening the commercial intercourse between the United States and the British colonies in America upon principles of liberal reciprocity.

This policy was manifested in the act of Congress, passed at their last session, authorizing the President, by anticipation, to open the ports of the United States to British vessels from the ports of the British colonies in the West Indies, which might, in the interval before the next session of Congress, be opened to the vessels of the United States.

It was equally manifested by the executive Government when, immediately after receiving advice of the act of Parliament of the 24th of June last, "to regulate the trade between his Majesty's possessions in America and the West Indies, and other places in America and the West Indies," the proclamation was issued on the 24th of August, wherein, by a liberal construction of the act of Congress of the 6th of May, the ports of the United States were opened to British vessels coming from any of the ports of the British colonies in America which, by the act of Parliament, were opened to the vessels of the United States.

But the authority of the President was limited by the act of Congress of the 6th of May last to the opening of the ports of the United States to British vessels employed in the trade and intercourse between the United States and the British islands or colonies opened by the act of Parliament to the vessels of the United States, subject to such reciprocal rules and restrictions as the President might, by his proclamation, make and publish, "anything in the laws entitled an act concerning navigation, or an act entitled an act supplementary to an act concerning navigation, to the contrary notwithstanding."

The act of Congress does not authorize the President to extend to British vessels coming from the British ports in America the privileges enjoyed by British vessels from the European British ports by virtue of the convention of July 3, 1815, nor to remit duties levied upon British and all other foreign vessels not especially privileged by treaty or by mutual privilege sanctioned by law; nor to repeal any discrimination prescribed by other acts of Congress, than the two navigation acts above specified. The tonnage duty of one dollar, and the additional ten per cent. upon the duties levied on importations in foreign unprivileged vessels, are prescribed by other acts of Congress, and altogether independent of any restrictions which had been imposed on the commercial intercourse between the United States and the British colonies in America. They can be revoked only by the same authority by which they were enacted.

The act of Parliament does not extend to vessels of the United States, admitted by it into the colonial ports, the privileges secured to the same vessels entering the British ports in Europe, by virtue of the convention of July 3, 1815. It does not admit the vessels of the United States into the colonial ports on the same terms as they are admitted into the European ports. It admits them only on a footing of exceptions to a general system of exclusion, and under circumstances of a strong and marked discrimination to the advantage of British vessels, with which they must encounter competition in the same intercourse. Their admission is only to certain enumerated ports. They are permitted to introduce only certain enumerated articles, from which are excluded the most essential articles of the produce of the United States, and most needed in the colonial ports.* They are admitted only to a direct trade, both from the United States to the enumerated ports, and from the enumerated ports to the United States. They are subject to the payment, without credit, and before admission, of duties, in many cases, almost equivalent to prohibition; and to a very heavy export duty in addition to the duties prescribed by the act of Parliament. Nor does it appear that, with regard to the important article of port charges, they can claim admission upon the same footing of British vessels. To counteract these disadvantages, under which they must submit to enter in competition with British vessels employed in the same navigation, the regulations prescribed in the proclamation, and the additional tonnage and other discriminating duties provided by the laws of the United States are surely not more than sufficient. Nor can the United States, in imposing discriminations, the effect of which will be to restore to their own vessels that equal advantage of competition of which they would be deprived by discriminations operating against them, be confined to the mere specific counterparts of restrictions instituted by the other party to the commerce. Had they been so confined, they might have designated a specific list of articles to be admitted from all the British colonies, and, besides subjecting them to duties nearly prohibitory, might have excluded the article of rum, for example, from the list.

The colonies of Great Britain in the West India Islands are, in respect to every object of commerce and navigation, as distinct from those in North America as any two nations are from each other. Separated by an ocean, and having scarcely a single article of commercial interchange in common, the productions of neither can, in the natural course of trade, be objects of export from the other. Instead, therefore, of excluding from admission all the articles of the produce of both, with the exception of a small enumerated list, the proclamation has authorized the general admission of all the articles from either of its own natural growth or produce, excluding only the admission from either of those articles which it never could export but in consequence of their having been before imported to it from abroad.

On the first perusal of the act of Parliament for opening the colonial ports, it was perceived that, to the satisfactory accomplishment of the objects interesting to the commercial intercourse between the United States and the British colonies in America, which it was believed to be the intention of its enactment to promote, a further free communication and understanding between the two Governments would be necessary. The proclamation was forthwith issued, commensurate with the authority given to the President by the act of Congress, understood in the most enlarged import of the words in which it was given; and by an immediate instruction to the minister of the United States at London he was empowered to make known to your Government as well the disposition of this country to meet with fair and equal reciprocity this and every overture on the part of Great Britain for opening the commercial intercourse between the United States and the British colonies in this hemisphere, as the conviction of this Government that further measures on both sides would be indispensable to obtain that result in a manner satisfactory to both. That they may be adopted in concert, either by further legislation or by convention, is referred to the consideration and submitted to the option of your Government.

I pray you, sir, to accept the assurance of my distinguished consideration.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

Mr. Canning to Mr. Adams.

WASHINGTON, November 18, 1822.

SIR: In answer to the disposition which you express in your letter of the 11th instant, to co-operate on the part of your Government in every measure necessary for opening the commercial intercourse between the British colonies in America and the ports of the United States on principles of liberal reciprocity, I can only assure you of my readiness to transmit your communication to his Majesty's ministers.

The American envoy in London, whom you describe as having been empowered some weeks ago to make a declaration of similar purport, has doubtless by this time apprised the British Government of the views entertained by his cabinet. He will probably be enabled to satisfy you that the British Legislature, in adopting the measures already in force for opening the colonial trade, has carried its liberality to an extent which can only be justified by the persuasion that every one of those measures will be met by foreign Governments with a prompt and complete return. As the representations which I thought it my duty to address to you on the 25th ultimo were grounded upon the very principle which you acknowledge, I learn with regret that the President has not been invested by Congress with power to remove the discriminating duties by an immediate exercise of his discretion.

You will remember, sir, that the object of my former letter was to point out the serious and unexpected disparity subsisting between the provisions of the new act of Parliament and the regulations enforced by the Treasury circular of September the 14th. I thought myself warranted in supposing that it was naturally the wish and intention, no less than the interest of the United States to abstain from originating any discrimination in the charges imposed upon the vessels of the respective countries. A desire to extend the principle of reciprocity to all possible cases can hardly preclude the application of that principle to those which already exist. But what is the situation of the two parties at this moment? A British vessel entering a port of the United States from one of the enumerated colonies is subject to a heavy discriminating duty on its tonnage and to another on its cargo, from both which charges the American trade is free. No such inequality appears to exist on the other side. There is reason, on the contrary, to believe that in his Majesty's colonies the vessels of both nations, trading under the new act of Parliament, are at present subject only to the same duties. I have already shown that the necessary consequence of this state of things is to give the American trader a most undue and preponderating advantage over his British competitor. It might, in fact, be proved to conviction, by a short and obvious calculation, that a continuance of the present system must soon exclude the shipping of Great Britain from all participation in this trade.

You will allow me, sir, to observe that the question here at issue does by no means involve a comparison between the terms on which the vessels of the United States are received into his Majesty's European ports and those on which they are permitted to trade with the enumerated colonies. The colonial commerce stands, as it has always stood, on separate grounds. The very terms of the commercial treaty to which you have adverted establish this fact. By the late act of Parliament a direct trade has been declared open, on condition of reciprocity, between certain of his Majesty's colonial ports and the neighboring islands and countries, of which the United States are one. Within the limits of the trade thus opened it is that the privileges, of which a return in like privileges is the declared condition, must naturally be sought. So long, therefore, as it appears that the vessels of the two countries engaged in this direct trade are admitted, on payment of equal charges, into the colonial ports, it is surely not a strange or intemperate pretension to expect that they should also be admitted on the same equal terms into the harbors of the United States. The charges and restrictions of a detailed nature which you represent as disadvantageous to the American trade, however inconvenient they may prove in themselves, can never be admitted as proper subjects of complaint while the other parties, native as well as foreign, to the same branch of commercial intercourse, are equally subject to their operation.

With respect to the limitation on imported articles, the form of which limitation, whether the articles admitted or the articles prohibited be mentioned by name, is sufficiently immaterial, it will be found that the 17th and 18th sections of the act of Parliament provide with care for a perfect equality of competition. It is expressly enacted in those sections that British built vessels are subject, in common with foreign vessels, to the restrictions affecting the articles imported, as well as the number of places at which the importation of them is permitted. As countervailing measures, the efficacy of the discriminating duties may surely be questioned, since the very exaction of them by one party must necessarily imply the right of imposing them by the other.

I cannot dismiss this subject without noticing the reasons which you have given in support of the distinction taken in the proclamation of August 24 between his Majesty's West Indian colonies and those which are situated in North America. Their separation by sea and the different nature of their productions are stated as circumstances entitling them to be viewed, commercially, as distinct and unconnected nations. Whatever may be the merits of this doctrine in its bearing on commercial law, it cannot be true with regard to the two discriminated portions of his Majesty's colonies without being equally applicable to the northern and southern divisions of this extensive country. The productions of New England are quite as distinct from the staple exports of Louisiana and Georgia as the productions of Canada can possibly be from those of Jamaica. That the several territories should, in the one instance, be divided by the ocean, and, in the other, by a vast continental region, is a difference of little weight in the eye of commerce. You need not be told, sir, that the sea is, unquestionably, the most rapid conductor of commercial intercourse. With the aid of nautical science, it serves to approximate nations, and brings the most remote into a sort of neighborhood with each other. Hence it was that, observing the act of Parliament to contain no restriction affecting the importation of the enumerated articles from one part more than from any other of the United States, I thought myself bound to point out the utter inapplicability of the term "corresponding" to the restrictive regulation announced in that character by the American Government. I venture to repeat that this restriction has no counterpart in the act of Parliament. The limitation on the nature of imports with which you confront it is altogether of a different nature, and rests on principles generally acknowledged.

In further confirmation of the view which I have taken of this question, I may appeal to the official and recorded decisions of the Treasury. In a letter dated the 29th of September, 1817, and addressed by the head of that Department to the Collectors of the Customs, it is expressly declared that the word "country," as employed in the first section of the act concerning navigation, is to be "considered as embracing all the possessions of a foreign State, however widely separated, which are subject to the same supreme executive and legislative authority."

I avail myself, with pleasure, of this opportunity to repeat to you, sir, the assurance of my distinguished consideration.

Mr. Canning to Mr. Adams.

Mr. Stratford Canning presents his compliments to the Secretary of State, and, agreeably to his request, encloses copies of the two statements relative to the charges levied on British and alien vessels in British West Indian ports, which he put into Mr. Adams' hands yesterday. He adds an extract of a letter from a commercial house at Barbadoes, concerning the same subject, which he had the honor of showing to Mr. Adams some time ago.

WASHINGTON CITY December 4, 1822.

Extract of a letter from a respectable house in Barbadoes, dated September 25, 1822.

"We are in a new era in the commerce of these islands. The act of Parliament to regulate the trade between his Majesty's possessions in America and the West Indies, and other places in America and the West Indies, reached us on the 11th of August, and we received, three days ago, President Monroe's proclamation, founded thereon, of the 24th ultimo. How all this will work remains to be seen by and by. At present we can only tell you that, by an order from the Commissioners of the Customs in London to the customs here, which accompanied the act, foreign vessels are to be subject to the same fees exacted upon British vessels, and no higher. So that we may suppose that British vessels from these islands are to pay the same fees as American vessels in the United States, and that our vessels are to be no longer subject to the tonnage duty of one dollar per ton, and will pay six cents only, the same as American and British vessels from Europe; and, furthermore, that the produce of these islands imported into the States in British bottoms will also be relieved of the additional duties heretofore enacted in foreign bottoms. We look for information from you on all these points."

Truly extracted.

WASHINGTON, December 18, 1822.

The undersigned presents his compliments to the Secretary of State, and requests his attention to the two accompanying papers, being copies, the one of a letter from his Majesty's Consul at Baltimore, the other of a letter addressed to that gentleman by the Collector of the Customs at Kingston, in Jamaica, both confirmatory of the fact already communicated to the Government of the United States with respect to the non-existence of any discrimination in the charges levied on British and alien vessels entering the colonial ports of his Majesty, under the provisions of the act of Parliament passed on the 24th of last June.

STRATFORD CANNING.

Mr. Crawford to Mr. Canning.

BRITISH CONSULATE, Baltimore, December 17, 1822.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit for your information a letter just received from the Collector of the port of Kingston, Jamaica, by which it will be found that no higher duties or port charges are payable on American vessels and their cargoes in that island than are levied on those of Great Britain.

The American schooner "Rising Sun" has just arrived here from Barbadoes, the captain of which vessel states that he was informed by the Collector of the port that the same duties, &c., were payable alike on British as American vessels and cargoes.

I have the honor to be, &c., &c., &c.,

JOHN CRAWFORD.

Right Honorable STRATFORD CANNING.

Mr. Macdowall to Mr. Crawford.

KINGSTON, Jamaica, October 21, 1822.

SIR: I am honored in receipt of your esteemed favor of the 6th ultimo, and I lose not a moment in answering your several queries, which are of the greatest importance to the mercantile world.

I beg to state, for your information, that at present no distinction is made in fees to officers, duties on tonnage, or other island dues, (i. e., hospital and gunpowder dues,) between British vessels and those of the United States coming from the same countries; pilotage and harbor master's charges are also the same on vessels of both nations.

Goods of the growth and production of the United States of America, which may be legally imported, are liable to and pay the same duties, whether brought here in vessels of Great Britain or those of the States.

For these reasons, I conceive it will only be an act of justice that any duties charged on British ships arriving in the United States, and to which their own vessels are not subject, should be done away with.

I have the honor to be, &c.,

H. MACDOWALL.

JOHN CRAWFORD, Esq., Baltimore.

Mr. Canning to Mr. Adams.

WASHINGTON, January 13, 1823.

The undersigned, his Britannic Majesty's Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary, in communicating to the Secretary of State the enclosed papers which he has recently received in further confirmation of the fact already, as he conceives, established by sufficient evidence, that no discriminating duties are levied under his Majesty's authority on American vessels now trading between the United States and the British colonies in North America and the West Indies, under the provisions of an act of Parliament bearing date the 24th of June, 1822, is unable to conceal the impressions with which he observes so many weeks allowed to pass away without a removal of the like discriminating duties from the vessels of his Majesty's subjects when entering the ports of the United States from the above mentioned colonies.

In the daily hope of receiving a satisfactory communication from the American Government, the undersigned has abstained for some time from pressing the Secretary of State further than by transmitting to him such documents as he has occasionally received in corroboration of his previous statements. He now feels it his duty to express a distinct conviction that the Government of the United States will see the propriety of enabling him, without further delay, to inform his Majesty's ministers and the colonial authorities, definitively, whether the discriminating duties to which he refers are to be withdrawn from British vessels trading with this country, in pursuance of the President's proclamation of August 14, and under an expectation, which can hardly be disappointed, without injustice, of being at once admitted to the fair and full operation of such acts of Congress, including that of March 3, 1815, as appear to have an immediate application to the case.

The undersigned has the honor to repeat to the Secretary of State the assurance of his perfect consideration.

STRATFORD CANNING.

Hon. JOHN QUINCY ADAMS, Secretary of State, &c.

Copy of a letter from the Collector and Comptroller of his Majesty's customs at Halifax, transmitted by his Majesty's Consul at Baltimore.

CUSTOM-HOUSE, Halifax, December 9, 1822.

SIR: We have the honor of informing you that we are not aware of any duties or fees, authorized by act of Parliament, being received on foreign vessels at this port, other than those directed to be enforced on vessels belonging to his Majesty's subjects.

We are, &c., &c., &c.,

THOS. N. GETTEN, Collector.
J. WALLACE, Comptroller.

Extract from a letter from the Captain General and Governor of St. Christopher, Neirs, Anguilla, and the Virgin Islands, addressed to his Majesty's Consul General in the United States.

"You will perceive, on reference to the accompanying document, that the American vessels are admitted into these ports, paying the same duties as those to which British vessels are subject."

ST. CHRISTOPHER.

We, the acting Collector and Comptroller of his Majesty's customs at the port of Basseterre, do hereby certify that, agreeably to the act of 3 George IV, chapter 44, the same fees and duties are payable on British vessels and their cargoes as those paid on American vessels and their cargoes, and that the American vessels are placed on the same footing, in every respect, with British vessels with regard to custom-house expenses.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, January 15, 1823.

SIR: I have had the honor of receiving your note of the 13th instant, with its enclosures. Your note and its enclosures have been communicated to the committee of the Senate who have under consideration a bill for regulating the commercial intercourse between the United States and the ports in the British colonies opened to the shipping of foreign nations by the act of Parliament of the 24th of June last.

It has already been observed in our preceding correspondence on this subject that the repeal of the discriminating duties upon the tonnage of foreign vessels, and upon merchandise imported in them, is exclusively within the competency of the legislative power.

The act of Congress of March 3, 1815, having been enacted exclusively with reference to the modification or mutual abolition of all discriminating or countervailing duties in the commerce between the United States and foreign nations, has no application to the limited and restricted intercourse which may, by mutual consent and regulation, be opened between the United States and particular ports in the colonies of a foreign nation. The act contemplates a reciprocal abandonment of the discriminating or countervailing duties of the nation, and not the removal of interdictions to any direct commercial intercourse with colonies. The act of Parliament of 24th June last abolishes no discriminating or countervailing duties which existed in the British colonies to the disadvantage of the United States. It partially opens certain ports to the admission, in foreign vessels, of certain articles to which they had been previously closed. The precedent condition, therefore, upon which alone the President of the United States was authorized to act by virtue of the act of Congress of March 3, 1815, does not exist, nor are the provisions of that law applicable to the case.

It may be added that even the principle of the law is not more applicable than its letter. Discriminating duties, operating to the disadvantage of the United States, still exist in the British colonies now opened to their navigation. It is a discrimination that the vessel of the United States, which has entered a colonial port from the United States, is compelled to return directly to them, and to pay a heavy export duty upon any cargo which she may take on the return voyage; while the British vessel, entering the same colonial port, also from the United States, has the world before her for her subsequent progress, and pays no export duty upon the cargo which she takes to any other British colonial port or to Great Britain. The American vessel, therefore, if entering the colonial port upon equal terms with the British, goes out of it charged with heavy duties, from which the British vessel is exempted. The discrimination is not the less effectual for being indirect.

I avail myself of this opportunity of stating that numerous complaints have been and continue to be received at this Department of the oppressive and ruinous effect of the construction given to the act of Parliament of 24th June last, in several of the British colonies, in the case of citizens of the United States who have entered their ports under the provisions of that act. The concurring reports of most of the persons who have adventured upon shipments to those ports confirm the anticipations entertained by this Government, from the first appearance of the act of Parliament, that this intercourse can be definitively regulated to the satisfaction of both parties only by concert between the two Governments. To the adoption of this concert the Government of the United States is, as it has been, prepared to contribute by a disposition of perfect reciprocity and most cordial good will.

I pray you, sir, to accept the assurance of my distinguished consideration.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

Mr. Canning to Mr. Adams.

WASHINGTON, January 25, 1823.

SIR: From your letter, dated the 18th instant, I learn that Congress alone is competent to the removal of those discriminating duties to which, by several communications, including my note of the 13th, I have lately had the honor to call your attention, inasmuch as the act of March 3, 1815, was intended to apply to the commercial intercourse of nations, and not to that of colonies. This declaration, little as it may answer to my own impressions, being accompanied with the information that a bill directly bearing on this subject is now under the consideration of a committee of the Senate, to which my representations with respect to the discriminating duties have been communicated, I address you at this moment for the sole purpose of noticing two or three points, as stated in your letter, which I think capable of being viewed in a different and more satisfactory light.

You observe, for instance, that no discriminating duties which existed in the British colonies to the disadvantage of the United States are abolished by the act of Parliament, under which the trade is now open. Correct as this statement may be in point of fact, the inference to which it leads is not the less erroneous, except it can be shown that enactments authorizing the eventual collection of such duties were really in force at the time when the colonial trade was open to foreigners. The silence of the new act is otherwise all that can be required for any practical purpose. The only essential point is the non-existence of the duties in question, and to the recognition of this reality it was natural to expect that the American Government would be prepared to hold out every facility.

To prove that discriminating duties, operating to the prejudice of the United States, do actually exist in the British colonies, you state that an American vessel, when clearing out on her return from a colonial port, is subject to a heavy export duty on her cargo, from which the British vessel is exempt. Of any such export duty I have no knowledge beyond what I derive from your letter; but, taking the fact for granted, I am persuaded that the duty, if levied at all, is equally levied on British and on alien vessels employed in the direct trade, and ought not, therefore, to be classed with duties imposed on a principle of discrimination. With regard to any indirect advantage which the British trader may possibly derive from the circumstance of his having a wider range for his export voyage, it is one which, so long as any commercial restrictions whatever are maintained, must obviously belong to the native, whoever he may be, in the harbors of his own country. The foreigner, in his turn, finds a compensation in the enjoyment of the like advantages when at home. This local disparity, unavoidable in the present or in any probable state of the civilized world, is not peculiar to the colonial trade. With some variation in the degree, it exists in all countries where commerce is an object of legislative care.

On the subject of any arrangement by negotiation between the two Governments, agreeably to the suggestion contained in your letter, it would be idle for me to occupy your time, as you will doubtless be apprised of the views entertained by his Majesty's ministers directly through the American envoy at London, by whose channel you mention, in a preceding letter, that an early communication of the same purport was to be made. I feel, at the same time, that I should hardly do justice to the sentiments of amity and good will which his Majesty's Government have ever been disposed to cherish towards this country, were I not to express my readiness to bring under their notice those cases to which you refer as arising out of a harsh construction of the late acts of Parliament, and pressing with undue rigor on the interests of American citizens, though it should not be forgotten that much of those complaints may, perhaps, be found, on inquiry, to proceed from individuals too deeply intent on their commercial gains to submit with willingness even to the most indispensable regulations.

I beg, sir, that you will accept the assurances of my perfect consideration.

STRATFORD CANNING.

Hon. JOHN QUINCY ADAMS, Secretary of State.

Remarks on a bill "to regulate the commercial intercourse between the United States and certain British colonial ports."

It may be observed, in the first place, that the general tone and character of this bill are strikingly restrictive, considering how much the important changes recently introduced into the colonial trade of Great Britain are calculated to meet the declared views of the United States.

SEC. 3. —— "or upon the like goods, wares, and merchandise, imported into the said colonial ports from elsewhere."

This clause in the third section appears susceptible of a construction which, if intended, would surely put the question of the discriminating duties on a footing no less unexpected than irreconcilable with the fair and natural view of the subject. In the commercial relations, as regulated between the United States and the British European territories, the non-existence of alien charges and discriminating duties on one side, is received as the proper and sufficient return for the non-existence of the like charges and duties on the other. Both parties remain at liberty to raise revenue, and to protect their home produce by levying duties on foreign imported articles.

SEC. 5. "Having come directly" —— "other than in such as shall have come directly from one of the said ports of the United States."

This condition which limits the permission to export, in the case of British vessels, to such as have previously come directly from any of the enumerated ports, does not appear to have any counterpart in the British act of Parliament, which only insists upon the exportations being made direct to the ports of the country to which the vessel belongs, the condition of a direct voyage, in cases of importation, being applied to the articles, if any, so imported, and not to the vessel.

With respect to exportations from the enumerated colonies to the United States, it may be well to observe that the act of Parliament does not confine the power of exportation to articles of colonial produce and manufacture, but freely extends it to all articles whatever, being the growth, produce, or manufacture, of any part of the British dominions. It is obvious that this branch of intercourse cannot be otherwise than beneficial to the mercantile concerns of both countries.

In addition to these more prominent points, a verbal alteration or two might, perhaps, be admitted for the sake of clearness and mutual convenience.

SEC. 2. —— "coming directly."	The word directly appears superfluous in this place. It can hardly be meant as a condition to the admittance of the vessel; and the directness of the voyage, in cases of importation from the enumerated colonies, is secured by the 4th section.
SEC. 2. —— "the importation of the like articles, to which, from elsewhere is not, or shall not be prohibited by law."	If it be meant by this clause that the only articles of colonial produce, &c., the importation of which is not to be allowed in British vessels, are such as are forbidden by other acts to be imported at all from any country, the present wording will, perhaps, be found to present some obscurity which it might be of use to remove.
SEC. 3. "Provided always," &c.	If proof of the non-existence of discriminating duties on the British side be a requisite preliminary to their renewal on the part of the United States, is not this proviso superfluous?
SEC. 5. "Elsewhere."	The signification of this word, as here employed, seems hardly clear. If it be intended, as may be inferred from the text, to mean "to other countries," would not this latter expression be more distinct?

Memorandum communicated by Mr. Stratford Canning to Mr. Adams, February 17, 1823.

It may be interesting to the American Government to know that the equality of duties on tonnage and imports levied on British and foreign vessels trading to the British colonies under the act of Parliament, dated June 24, 1822, of which equality information was, some time ago, officially given to the American Secretary of State, is not at all likely to be disturbed by the British Government so long as the United States, after having adopted, adhere to a similar policy; and that if the Government of the United States should have any preference for giving to that equality, on both sides, the more formal shape of a treaty, the British Government would not object to enter into negotiation for that purpose.

By the act of Parliament, permission is given to American in common with British vessels to export from the enumerated colonies all articles whatever being of the growth, produce, or manufacture of any part of the British dominions. Though by far the greater part of the exports of British goods to the United States would naturally go by the direct line of conveyance, cases might occur in which the operations of commerce would, perhaps, be facilitated by means of the extended permission just specified. The only object of inserting that permission in the act of Parliament was, to enable the merchant who might accidently find the West India market overstocked with British goods, to dispose of them by sending them on to the United States either in an American or British ship. This intercourse (whenever, in particular cases, it might happen to be carried on) could hardly prove otherwise than beneficial to the mercantile concerns of both countries; but it has not escaped the observation of the British Government that, unless it be permitted on the part of the United States, as it now is on that of Great Britain, in common to British as well as to American vessels, a door would manifestly be opened to complaints from British merchants of a want of due reciprocity from the United States.

WASHINGTON, February 17, 1823.

Extract of a letter, No. 64, from Mr. Adams to Mr. Rush, dated Department of State, June 23, 1823.

I have the honor of enclosing herewith copies of the correspondence between the British minister residing here, Mr. Stratford Canning, and this Department, since the close of the last session of Congress, relating to the act of 1st March, 1823, "to regulate the commercial intercourse between the United States and certain British colonial ports."

This act was intended as a corresponding measure on the part of the United States to the act of Parliament of 24th of June, 1822, (3 Geo. IV, ch. 44.) On the 24th August, 1822, immediately after this act of Parliament was received here, the President of the United States issued the proclamation, a copy of which was transmitted to you with my despatch, No. 59, of the 27th of the same month.

That proclamation was issued in conformity with an act passed at the preceding session of Congress, (U. S. Laws, 17th Cong., 1st Sess., p. 49,) which had provided that, on satisfactory evidence being given to the President of the United States that the ports in the islands or colonies in the West Indies, under the dominion of Great Britain, had been opened to the vessels of the United States, the President should be authorized to issue his proclamation, declaring that the ports of the United States should thereafter be open to the vessels of Great Britain employed in the trade and intercourse between the United States and such islands or colonies, subject to such reciprocal rules and restrictions as the President might by such proclamation make and publish, anything in the laws entitled "An act concerning navigation," or an act entitled "An act supplementary to an act concerning navigation," to the contrary notwithstanding.

The proclamation of the President was necessarily limited by the authority given in the law; and the law was enacted in anticipation of measures known to be then depending in Parliament, one of the objects of which was the opening of the British colonial ports to foreign vessels, including those of the United States. When the act of Congress passed (May 6, 1822) it was not known what colonial ports would be opened by the expected act of Parliament, nor under what rules and restrictions. It was, therefore, expressed in general and indefinite terms, looking to the opening of the ports in the British West Indies generally, and manifesting the disposition to meet the British Government forthwith in any plan for opening the ports to the navigation of both countries upon terms of reciprocity, the laws of both countries having at that time interdicted the trade between the United States and those colonies in the vessels of either nation.

This interdiction on the part of the United States had been effected by the two laws referred to in the act of 6th of May, 1822—the act concerning navigation bearing date the 18th of April, 1818, (U. S. Laws, vol. 6, p. 296,) and the supplementary act the 5th of May, 1820.

These laws had been enacted as counteractive of those of a like character long before existing on the part of Great Britain, interdicting the trade in vessels of the United States. They had been resorted to after the failure of repeated attempts to settle, by amicable negotiation, the manner in which the trade might be regulated upon principles of reciprocity—attempts which were renewed immediately after the passage of the first of them, and upon the abortive issue of which the second received the sanction of Congress.

This intermediate negotiation between the 18th of April, 1818, and the 15th of May, 1820, must be constantly borne in mind in all discussion of the measures adopted on the part of the United States predicated upon the act of Parliament of June 24, 1822, opening the colonial ports. The whole subject of it is familiar to your memory as one of the negotiators of the convention of October 20, 1818, and as the sole subsequent negotiator concerning the article referred by the plenipotentiaries of the United States, who concluded that convention, to their Government.

By the convention of 3d July, 1815, the commercial intercouse between the United States and the British territories in Europe was placed, in relation to navigation and revenue, on the following footing:

1. No other or higher duties of importation are to be imposed in either country on any articles the growth, produce, or manufacture of the other, than are payable on the like articles being the growth, produce, or manufacture of any other foreign country.

2. No higher or other duties or charges of exportation are to be imposed on any articles exported to the two countries, respectively, than are payable on the exportation of the like articles to any other foreign country.

3. No prohibition of exportation or importation of articles the growth, produce, or manufacture of either country to the other, which shall not equally extend to all other nations.

4. No higher or other duties or charges to be imposed in the ports of either party upon the vessels of the other than upon its own.

5. The same duties to be paid on the importation of articles the growth, produce, or manufucture of either country into the ports of the other, whether imported in the vessels of the United States or of Great Britain.

6. The same duties to be paid and the same bounties allowed on the exportation of articles the growth, produce, or manufacture of either country to the other, whether exported in British vessels or in vessels of the United States.

7. In cases of drawbacks allowed upon re-exportation of any goods the growth, produce, or manufacture of either country to the other, respectively, the amount of drawback to be the same, whether the goods re-exported were originally imported in a British or an American vessel.

8. But when the re-exportation is to any other foreign country, the parties reserve to themselves, respectively, the right of regulating or diminishing the drawback.

9, and lastly. The intercourse between the United States and the British West Indies, and on the continent of North America, was not to be affected by any of these provisions, but each party was to remain in complete possession of its rights with respect to such an intercourse.

The system of reciprocity, with regard to navigation, established by this article between the United States and the British possessions in Europe, was substantially the acceptance of a proposal made to all the nations with which the United States have commercial intercourse, by the act of Congress of March 3, 1815, conditionally repealing our discriminating duties.—(U. S. Laws, vol. 4, p. 824.) But it was expressly limited to the British possessions in Europe; and, while accepting it thus far, the British Government reverted to the system of interdiction to the admission of our vessels into her American colonial ports.

The direct trade between the United States and Great Britain was so interwoven with and dependent upon that between the United States and its colonies, that this convention would have been worse than nugatory to the United States, if, while the European part of this intercouse was placed upon a footing of entire reciprocity, that between the United States and the colonies had been exclusively monopolized by British navigators. This was practically felt from the moment that the convention took effect; and in the year 1816 several efforts were made to induce the British Government to adjust this collision of interests by amicable negotiation.—(See message of the President of the United States of February 13, 1823, pp. 37, 39, 49; also, documents of the 15th Congress, 1st session, [87,] report of the committee of the House of Representatives of the United States of February 9, 1818, document marked F.)

In March, 1817, a draught of four articles was communicated by Lord Castlereagh, through your predecessor, to the Government of the United States, which was stated to embrace all that could then be assented to by Great Britain towards admitting the United States to a participation in the trade between them and the colonies.

The first of these articles extended to the United States the provisions of the Free Port acts of Parliament of June 27, 1805, and June 30, 1808, authorizing a certain trade, in certain enumerated articles, with certain enumerated ports of British West India islands, to the colonial inhabitants of foreign European possessions, in vessels of one deck. The island of Bermuda was included in the provisions of this act.

The second article made a special and additional provision for the trade between the United States and the island of Bermuda, allowing a longer list of articles both of import and export, and without limitation as to the size or form of the vessels to be employed in the trade.

The third article proposed to allow access to vessels of the United States to Turk's Island for salt, and to import tobacco and cotton wool, produce of the United States. The fourth proposed to regulate the intercourse between the United States and the British territories adjoining them on the continent of North America.

After a full and deliberate consideration, these articles were considered by the Government of the United States as not acceptable, and the act of Congress of April 18, 1818, concerning navigation, was passed.

The negotiation of the convention of October 20, 1818, immediately afterwards ensued, with regard to which you are referred—

Letter from this Department to you, May 27, 1820, transmitting the act of Congress of May 15, 1820, (p. 101.)

By the act of Congress of April 15, 1818, concerning navigation, the ports of the United States were, from the 30th of September of that year, closed against British vessels coming from any British colony by the ordinary laws of navigation and trade closed against vessels of the United States, and British vessels sailing with cargoes from ports of the United States were laid under bonds to land their cargoes in some port or place other than in a colony closed against vessels of the United States.

It was a non-intercourse in British vessels, with ports closed by British laws against the vessels of the United States.

By the supplementary act of May 15, 1820, the ports of the United States were, from the 30th of September of that year, closed against British vessels coming or arriving by sea from any British colonial ports in the West Indies, or American British vessels from ports of the United States, were laid under bonds to land their cargoes in some place other than any British American colony; and articles of British West Indian or North American produce were allowed to be imported into the United States only direct from the province, colony, plantation, island, possession, or place of which they were wholly the growth, produce, or manufacture; it was a non-intercourse in British vessels with all the British American colonies, and a prohibition of all articles the produce of those colonies, except the produce of each colony imported directly from itself.

In the meantime, an act of Parliament of May 8, 1818, (58 Geo. 3, ch. 19,) and an order of Council of May 27, 1818, founded thereon, opened the ports of Halifax, in Nova Scotia, and of St. John's, in New Brunswick, to the vessels of all foreign nations in amity with Great Britain for importation of certain enumerated articles, and for exportation to the country to which the foreign vessel should belong. This act was limited in its duration to three years and six weeks after the commencement of the then next session of Parliament, but the order of Council specifying the ports to which it should be extended was revocable at pleasure.

This act of Parliament and order in Council were construed in the United States not to affect, in any manner, the provisions of the act of Congress of April 15, 1818. The ports of Halifax and St. John's remained closed against vessels of the United States by the ordinary laws of navigation and trade, although opened for a limited time by an order of Council revocable at pleasure. Their real condition, therefore, in October, 1818, was that of being open to the vessels of the United States, while the ports of the United States were closed against British vessels coming from them.

It was on the 6th of October, 1818, that the British plenipotentiaries, at the negotiation of the convention of the 20th of that month, proposed the article D, relating to the intercourse between the United States and the provinces of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, which article they, on the 19th, declared was, together with the one offered in March, 1817, relating to Bermuda, a sine qua non of any article to be signed by them relating to the direct intercourse between the United States and the British colonies in the West Indies.

And the article D contained precisely the same list of articles importable, and the same limitations with regard to export in vessels of the United States as were already contained in the act of Parliament of the 8th and in the order in Council of the 27th of May, 1818, and the article further proposed an equalization of duties of impost and tonnage on the vessels and articles employed in the trade, whether British or American. So that the proposition really was, that the United States should open to the British a free and equal participation of the intercourse between the United States and the provinces of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, then, by the counteracting regulations of the two countries, exclusively enjoyed by the United States themselves.

The article relating to the intercourse between the United States and Bermuda was yet more remarkable. By an act of Parliament of July 1, 1812, (52 Geo. 3, ch. —,) sugar and coffee, the produce of any British colony or plantation in the West Indies, imported into the island of Bermuda in British ships was allowed to be exported from the port of St. George to the United States in any foreign ship above sixty tons burden belonging to any country in amity with Great Britain, and a list of articles enumerated was allowed to be imported from the United States to the said port in any foreign ship belonging to any country in amity with Great Britain, and this list contained, besides every article enumerated in the proposal of the British plenipotentiaries, horses and cattle, sheep, hogs, poultry, and live stock of any sort, which, in the British proposal, were excluded from the Bermuda list and transferred to that of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick. To the articles of sugar and coffee, exportable by the act of Parliament, the proposal added molasses, cocoanuts, ginger, and pimento.

These two articles, therefore, were to be considered as the equivalents asked of the United States for the admission proposed of their vessels to any British ports in the West Indies which should be open to the vessels of any other foreign power or State.

The following parallel lists of articles proposed to be admitted for importation and exportation in the intercourse between the United States on the one part, and Nova Scotia, with New Brunswick, Bermuda, and the West Indies, on the other, by the three connected and inseparable articles proposed by the British plenipotentiaries, may serve further to elucidate the character of the proposal.

By another act of Parliament of May 23, 1818, the articles of tobacco, rice, grain, peas, beans, and flour, were allowed to be imported in British vessels into any British colony in the West Indies, or on the continent of South America, from any foreign European colony in America. And peas and beans were allowed to be imported into the enumerated ports of the British West Indies from foreign European, the possession in the West Indies, and on the continent of America, in foreign single-decked vessels.

In the letter from this Department to you, of the 7th of May, 1819, a comparative view was taken between the articles which had been proposed at the third conference by the American plenipotentiaries at the negotiation of the convention, and the articles proposed at the fifth and eighth conferences by the British plenipotentiaries, and then received by the American plenipotentiaries for reference to their Government; and a draught of two articles was enclosed with the letter, forming a compromise between the two proposals reviewed, and which you were authorized to offer as a final proposal on the part of this Government in relation to the subject. These articles, acceding to a limited and enumerated list of ports of importation in the British colonies, and to a limited and enumerated list of articles importable in them, adhered only to two principles.

1. That the list of importable articles should be the same for the West Indies, for Bermuda, and for the North American provinces; and 2, that all the duties and charges imposable upon them should be equalized, and particularly that no other or higher duties should be charged upon them than upon similar articles when imported from any other country or place whatsoever. Your letter of the 14th of June, 1819, to this Department, announced that a copy of this draught had been submitted by you to the consideration of the British Government, and your letter of September 17, 1819, that they had declined accepting it. At the conference between you and Lord Castlereagh, when he informed you of this determination, he stated the special objections to the project upon which it had been founded, and you repeated to him the views of the Government of the United States on which the offer had been made. The supplementary navigation act of Congress was approved on the 15th of May, 1820.

This, then, was the relative state of the intercourse between the United States and 1, the provinces of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick; 2, the island of Bermuda; and 3, the British colonies in the West Indies, from the 30th of September, 1820, till the passage of the act of Parliament of June 24, 1822.

By the acts of Parliament of 3d George IV, chapters 42 and 43, the navigation act of 12 Charles II, chapter 18, was repealed, so far as related to the importation of goods and merchandise into Great Britain.

But the American trade acts, and the acts relating to importations from the British colonies in America and the West Indies, were left in full force.

The act of 3d George IV, chapter 44, purports to be an act to regulate the trade between his Majesty's possessions in America and the West Indies, and other places in America and the West Indies.

It leaves the principle of the navigation act of Charles II untouched, but by the first section repeals the whole series of what were called American trade acts—that is, acts regulating the trade between the United States of America and the British American and West India colonies since the independence of this country, beginning with the act of 28 Geo. III, ch. 39, and ending with 1 and 2 Geo. IV., ch. 7, twenty-five statutes, for which it substitutes the following system:

1. By the third section it provides that, from and after the passing of the act, a certain list of enumerated articles shall be importable into a certain list of enumerated ports in the British American colonies, insular or continental, in British vessels or in foreign vessels, bona fide the build of and owned by the inhabitants of the country of which the said articles are the growth, produce, or manufacture; or British built vessels, become their property, and navigated with a master and three-fourths of the mariners, at least, belonging to such country or place, provided that, in the foreign vessels, the articles shall only be brought directly from the country or place of which they are the growth, produce, or manufacture.

2. By the fourth section it allows the exportation from the enumerated ports in British vessels, or in any foreign ship or vessel, as aforesaid, of any article of the growth, produce, or manufacture of any of the British dominions, or any other article legally imported into the said ports, (arms and naval stores excepted, unless by license from his Majesty's Secretary of State,) provided that, in foreign ships, they shall be exportable only direct to the country or State in America or the West Indies to which the vessel belongs; and export bonds are to be given, in a penalty equal to half the value of the articles, that they shall be landed at the port or ports for which entered, and certificate of the landing to be produced within twelve months.

By the 7th section it is provided that upon a certain portion enumerated in schedule C, of the articles enumerated as importable in schedule B, certain duties shall be levied and collected when imported from any foreign island, State, or country, under the authority of the act.

The 11th section enacts that the same duties upon the foreign article shall also be levied if imported direct from any port of Great Britain and Ireland.

The 14th section authorizes the exportation in British vessels of the articles enumerated in schedule B to any other British colony or plantation in America or the West Indies, or to any port of Great Britain and Ireland subject to the provisions of navigation act of 12 Ch. II, ch. 18; and of 22 and 23 Ch. II, ch. 26, and 20 George III, ch. 10.

The 15th section authorizes the King, by order in council, to prohibit trade and intercourse with any country or island in America or the West Indies, if it shall appear to his Majesty that the privileges granted by this act to foreign ships and vessels are not allowed to British ships and vessels trading to and from any such country under the provisions of the act; and in case such order in council shall be issued, then, during the time of its being in force, none of the provisions of the act shall apply to any country or State the trade with which, under the provisions of the act, shall be prohibited by the order in council.

The 17th section prohibits, on penalty of the forfeiture of vessel and cargo, the importation into the enumerated ports, from any foreign country on the continent of America, or any island in the West Indies, of any articles except those enumerated in the schedule B.

And the 18th section prohibits, upon like penalty, the importation or exportation of any articles whatever from or to any foreign country on the continent of North or South America, or any foreign island in the West Indies, into or from any port of any British colony, plantation, or island, in America or the West Indies, not enumerated in the schedule A.

If the object of this act of Parliament was to open the ports of the British colonies in the West Indies and in America to the vessels of the United States upon terms of reciprocity, it was not well adapted to its purpose.

In the 15th section it is declared to be the intention and meaning of the act that the privileges granted by it to foreign ships and vessels shall be confined to the ships and vessels of such countries only as give the like privileges to British ships and vessels in their ports in America and the West Indies. And the King is authorized to issue his order in council prohibiting trade and intercourse under the authority of the act, if it shall appear to him that the privileges granted by this act to foreign ships and vessels are not allowed to British vessels trading to and from any such country or island under the provisions of this act.

Now, what are the privileges granted by this act to the vessels of the United States? That they may bring directly, and not otherwise, from some port of the United States to certain colonial ports named in the act of Parliament, and none others, certain articles of merchandise specifically named, and none others. That, upon their arrival, of all the articles which they are permitted to bring, they shall pay enormous duties upon that portion which consists of the productions of the United States, consumable in the colonies themselves; and the only portion which, in the results of the trade, would be to the United States profitable export, and to one part of the colonies necessary import. And these duties are to be paid, while the British vessels enjoying all the privileges granted by this act possess the additional and exclusive privilege of carrying to the same West India ports, directly or indirectly, the same articles; thus heavily charged when coming from the United States, but free from all duty when carried from the colony in North America to the colony in the West Indies.

Again, the vessel of the United States admitted to the above privileges has the further privilege, if she can procure a cargo, to return directly, and not otherwise, to the United States; and to give bond, upon penalty, equal to half the value of said cargo, for the landing it at the port or ports for which entered, and for producing a certificate thereof within twelve months. But there is a charge not indeed imposed by this act, but from which this act has not relieved them—that of paying a colonial export duty of four or five per cent. ad valorem upon this return cargo. To this charge British vessels may also be liable, if their owners choose to incur it; but if they prefer exporting their cargoes without paying any export duty, they are free to go to any part of the British dominions in Europe or America. They are not required to give the export bond for the landing of the articles at the port or ports for which entered, and for producing within twelve months a certificate thereof.

By the letter of the act of Parliament, if the privileges granted by it to the vessels of the United States should appear to the King not to be allowed to British vessels trading under the provisions of the act, he may, by an order in council, at his discretion, prohibit trade and intercourse under the authority of the act.

The words "the privileges granted by this act" are explained by the context of the section to mean like privileges to be allowed by the laws of the United States to British vessels employed in the same trade.

If an act of Congress had passed admitting British vessels coming from colonial British ports in America and the West Indies to enter a certain specified list of ports in the United States, selected at the pleasure of Congress, and no others; if it had allowed them to bring in those vessels an enumerated list of articles, (from which rum and molasses, for example, should be excluded,) and no others; if it had included, for example, sugar and coffee among the admissible articles, but burdened them with duties equivalent to ten per cent. ad valorem more than would be paid upon the same articles imported from elsewhere; if it had compelled the British vessels so admitted, if they took a return cargo, to give bonds for landing it at the port or ports in the British colonies for which the vessel should clear out; and if, not by the act of Congress, but by some law of the State from which this privileged British vessel should depart, an export duty of four or five per cent. ad valorem should be levied upon this her return cargo, then British vessels in the ports of the United States would have been allowed like privileges with those granted by the act of Parliament to vessels of the United States in the colonial ports. And so exactly like would they have been that, under such an act of Congress and such a grant of privileges to British vessels, the conditional authority given by the 15th section of the act of Parliament to the King, of prohibiting the trade and intercourse, would not have attached, according to the letter of the act, although it might have appeared to his Majesty that "the privileges granted by this act" were not allowed to British vessels trading to and from the United States under its provisions.

The privileges granted by this act could, of course, be allowed only by the same authority from which it emanated—that is, by the British Parliament. Like privileges would have been such as I have now described—that is, privileges subject to like limitations and restrictions which, as the bare exposition of them here will show, would have been found to be no privileges at all.

The act of Parliament opened certain colonial ports, upon certain very onerous conditions, to vessels of the United States. If the United States had opened their ports to British vessels from the colonies without condition or limitation, the privileges of British vessels in our ports would have been in nowise like those of the vessels of the United States in the colonial ports. In point of fact, the privilege of the British vessels would have been exclusive, and that of the American vessels exclusion.

Immediately after receiving the act of Parliament which opened certain ports of the British colonies in the West Indies and in America to the vessels of the United States, the President, exercising the authority given him by anticipation in the act of Congress of May 6, 1822, issued his proclamation opening the ports of the United States generally to British vessels coming from any of the ports enumerated in the act of Parliament. And in this proclamation he gave the most liberal construction, for the benefit of British vessels, to the act of Congress on which it was founded; for, by the laws of the United States when the act of Congress passed, and until the proclamation issued, the ports of the United States were closed against British vessels from any of the British colonies in the West Indies or in America, while, by the British laws, the ports of St. John's and Halifax, in New Brunswick and Nova Scotia, those of Port St. George and Hamilton, in the island of Bermuda, and the ports of the Bahama islands were opened to vessels of the United States. These ports, therefore, the act of Parliament did not open to our vessels, and the proclamation, by opening the ports of the United States to vessels coming from them, was much more extensive in its operation than the act of Parliament itself.

As reciprocal to the rules and restrictions under which the trade was permitted by the British Parliament, the President's proclamation provided that no articles should be imported into the United States in British vessels coming from the West Indies other than articles of the growth, produce, or manufacture of the British West India colonies, and none other than articles of the growth, produce, or manufacture of the British colonies in North America or Newfoundland, in British vessels coming, respectively, from that island or from North American colonies; and, by the existing revenue laws of the United States, all British vessels and their cargoes coming from any of the colonies remained subject to the foreign tonnage and impost duties. In my letter to you of August 27, 1822, enclosing a copy of this proclamation, I suggested to you the opinion that some further understanding between the two Governments would be necessary for regulating this trade in a manner advantageous to the interests of both parties, and the readiness of this Government to enter upon arrangements for that purpose with the British Government.

On the 25th of October, 1822, the British minister residing here addressed a note to this Department, containing representations against the rules and restrictions provided in the proclamation as not being specific counterparts to those of the act of Parliament, and also claiming exemption from the foreign tonnage and impost duties for British vessels and their cargoes coming from the colonies, because the act of Parliament subjected British and foreign vessels engaged in this trade only to the same duties and charges; and if there were in the colonies any discriminating charges against foreign vessels they did not appear in the act of Parliament.

I have shown you above what would have been a specific counterpart to the rules and restrictions of the act of Parliament, and to the colonial export duty coexisting with it. Had the President possessed the power of prescribing them by his proclamation, they would have been, in effect, equivalent to a total prohibition of the intercourse in British vessels, and appeared little better than a mockery. But the President had no such power. He could neither select an exclusive list of ports of admission, nor levy an export duty, nor repeal the foreign tonnage and impost. Mr. Canning's note was answered, and he replied. There was also much discussion of the subject between us at personal interviews, in which, as well as in his notes, he kept me constantly reminded of the authority given by the act of Parliament to the King to prohibit the intercourse by an order in council if the privileges granted by this act should not be allowed to British vessels, and of the necessity there would be of countervailing discriminations if those of the proclamation and the foreign tonnage and impost duty should remain.

In the course of this correspondence and of these conferences, which continued through the whole of the late session of Congress, Mr. Canning, with great earnestness, pressed the claim of admission for British vessels from the colonies free from all discriminating duties and charges, on the argument that there were no discriminating duties or charges operating against vessels of the United States in the colonies. On the 13th of January, 1823, he addressed to this Department a note claiming, distinctly the withdrawal of all the discriminating duties, and particularly the application to British vessels coming from the colonies, of the fair and full operation of such acts of Congress, including that of March 3, 1815, as appear to have an immediate application to the case.

In support of his argument, that there were no discriminating duties operating against us in the colonies, he then, and at other times, communicated copies of documents from a few of the enumerated ports, certifying that British and American vessels paid the same fees, or that, by the act of Parliament, they paid the same duties, or that they paid the same custom-house expenses; and he constantly urged that these were sufficient to establish the fact that our vessels and their cargoes paid in the colonies no other or higher fees, duties, or charges, than British vessels, and consequently the claim that British vessels from the colonies should pay no higher or other duties, fees, or charges, than our own. But he invariably declined pledging himself or his Government to any declaration that there were no discriminating duties in the enumerated ports, and we have now satisfactory information that, in some of them, there were and still are discriminations, to our disadvantage, besides those of the act of Parliament.

The act of Congress of March 1, 1823, "to regulate the commercial intercourse between the United States and certain British colonial ports," was introduced into the Senate by their Committee on Foreign Relations at an early period of the late session. In maturing it they had before them the act of Parliament of June 24, 1822, the President's proclamation, and the correspondence between Mr. Canning and this Department concerning it. While it was in discussion before the committee of the Senate, Mr. Canning, to whom a copy of the bill had been communicated, made some written remarks upon it, which were immediately submitted to the consideration of the committee. The full import of the term elsewhere, in the second, third, and fifth sections of the act, which formed the principal subject of these remarks, was deliberately examined and settled as well in the Senate as upon a consultation by the President with the members of the administration, and was explicitly made known to Mr. Canning.

The principle assumed by the act was not the repeal, but the suspension, during the continuance of the admission of our vessels into the colonial ports by the act of Parliament, of our two navigation acts.

In return for the opening of the colonial ports to our vessels by the act of Parliament, we opened our ports to British vessels from the same colonial ports. But as a power was left the King, by an order in council, to prohibit the trade and intercourse, it was necessary to be prepared for that contingency, if it should occur, by making the revival of our acts of navigation also contingent upon the same event.

As, by the act of Parliament, the intercourse in our vessels was limited to direct voyages both to and from the United States and the enumerated ports, the same limitation was prescribed for the intercourse in British vessels by the act of Congress. One of Mr. Canning's remarks was that the condition in the 5th section of our act, which limits the permission to export in British vessels to such as have previously come directly from any of the enumerated ports, did not appear to have any counterpart in the British act of Parliament. This is true; the counterpart was not in that act of Parliament, but in the old navigation act of 12 Ch. II. By that act no vessel of the United States could enter any of the enumerated ports coming from any other part of the world; and the act of June 24, 1822, admitted them only direct from the United States. No vessels of ours, therefore, other than such as have previously come direct from the United States to the enumerated ports, can export anything from them, because no other are admitted into the enumerated ports at all. Now, we could not exclude British vessels from coming to the United States from every other part of the world except the enumerated ports, which would be the full counterpart to the exclusion of the old navigation act of Charles II still in force against us; but we could and did exclude those coming from elsewhere from bringing with them merchandise from the enumerated ports, and those coming from the enumerated ports from bringing with them merchandise from elsewhere. The result was strictly reciprocal, though our act in granting the like privilege to that of the act of Parliament of June 24, 1822, annexed to it the like restriction to that of the old British navigation act of Charles the Second.

The principal objection of Mr. Canning was to the import of the term elsewhere. He was distinctly informed that the construction, of which he observes in his remarks it appears to be susceptible, was the construction which it was intended to bear and would receive.

But that it would put the question of the discriminating duties on a footing irreconcileable with the fair and natural view "of the subject" we can by no means admit.

As little do we admit that, having reference to the conclusion of the negotiation in 1819, it ought to have been unexpected. It has been seen that the United States then explicitly declined acceding to an article which would have opened the colonial ports, because it would have reserved to Great Britain the right of laying, in the colonial ports, higher duties upon articles of the growth, produce, or manufacture of the United States, than upon the like articles of the growth, produce, or manufacture of Great Britain or her own colonies. The act of Parliament, 3 Geo. IV, ch. 44, (of June 24, 1822,) opened the colonial ports with a threat to close them again, (or rather to prohibit all trade and intercourse with them,) if it should not be acceded to in all its parts of privilege, without regard to its conditions of restriction, or to the other restrictions, under which the privileges must be, if at all, accepted. It undertook to do by British laws that, the reserved right to do which we had unequivocally refused to accede to by compact. In the course of the conference with Mr. Canning I proved this to him by reading to him the parts of the joint letter from Messrs. Gallatin and Rush to this Department, of October 20, 1818, relating to the subject, and the extracts from your letters of June 14 and September 17, 1819, connected with it. The duties in the schedule C, of the act of Parliament, are all upon articles of the first necessity to the West India colonies; articles which can be furnished them only from the United States or from the adjoining North American British colonies; and articles constituting almost all the valuable exports allowed by the act of Parliament, and consumable in the colonies. They are all upon breadstuffs, live stock, and lumber; and the whole of them are equivalent to an average of at least ten per cent. upon the value of the articles. Of these articles the live stock and the lumber could be exported only from the northern parts of the United States. Could it possibly be supposed that, while, from the ports of the State of Maine, such articles imported into Jamaica, St. Kitts, or Antigua, should be burdened with a duty of ten per cent. upon their value, the same articles from the province of New Brunswick being admitted duty free, there could be any competition sustainable between the vessels of the two contries in which they should, on such unequal terms, be introduced? And if we add to this that, after disposing of her cargo, the vessel from New Brunswick might take a return cargo, also duty free, or might trade from colony to colony without restraint, while the vessel from Maine must depart in ballast or return to the United States laden with an export duty upon her cargo, what feature of reciprocity would there be, upon which the very idea of competition could escape the charge of absurdity?

The act of Congress, therefore, opens the ports of the United States to British vessels from the colonial ports enumerated in the act of Parliament, but not upon the identical terms prescribed in it.

The restrictions of the act of Congress are counterparts, not only to the restrictions of that particular act of Parliament, but to the others to which the American trade to the colonies is subject, whether by colonial laws or by the navigation act of Charles II; and as some of those British restrictions were of a character which we could not meet by specific counterparts, we met them by analogical restrictions, productive of the same result. This was insisted on by our plenipotentiaries at the discussion during the negotiation of the convention of 1818, and Great Britain could not justly expect the discriminating surcharges, the reserved right of levying which we unequivocally refused to sanction with our consent as a bargain, we should be ready to accept as a dispensation of British law. For an enumerated list of ports, part only of which are opened by the act of Parliament, we open all our ports in return. For an enumerated and very scanty list of importable articles, we agreed to receive in return all the valuable exportable articles of all the opened British colonies; for a duty of ten per cent. impost, and of four or five per cent. on exports, upon the value of the articles of the trade, we retain a foreign tonnage duty of ninety-four cents per ton on British vessels employed in the trade, and ten per cent. additional (not upon the value of the articles, but upon the impost duty otherwise charged upon it) upon the articles imported in them.

It is doubtful whether these countervailing restrictions, on our part, will prove sufficient to enable our vessels to pursue the trade in equal competition with the British; still more doubtful whether, under the double system of restrictions, the trade itself can be pursued in a manner which will relieve the British West India colonies from the distress which was rapidly hurrying them to ruin under the preceding restrictions of the navigation act of Charles the II. Surely the British Government must be aware that profit is the sine qua non of trade, and that, if they load with enormous duties the articles indispensable to the existence of their colonies, those duties must be paid by the colonies themselves, or they will smother the trade itself.

If the object of the act of Parliament was merely to balance the advantages of our proximity to the West Indians, their duties of import are at least five-fold too heavy. And as to the export duty, how could it possibly be paid upon articles to be brought into our market in competition with the like articles partly of our own produce, and most largely from Cuba, St. Domingo, and other West India islands, where no export duty exists? The result must be, and has already proved to be, that our vessels, admitted to the British colonial ports, can take no return cargoes, and must come away in ballast. So that, if they could sell their outward cargoes at a profit upon which the trade could live, it must be paid in specie by the colonists, leaving their staple commodities to rot upon their plantations or to the old monopoly of the market at home.

The request of explanation as to the extent of the meaning of the term elsewhere in the act of Congress, in Mr. Canning's correspondence with this Department since the close of the session, has not arisen from any doubt which he could entertain in his own mind of the construction which would be given to it here. This was fully discussed during the passage of the act, and well understood by him; but the eagerness of the British merchants in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, and in some of our cities, to have the trade entirely to themselves, prompted them to expect that a different construction would be given to the act—a construction which would have left the word elsewhere without any effect or meaning at all. Mr. Chipman, acting as Governor of New Brunswick, issued a proclamation declaring that in that province no other or higher duties of tonnage or impost, and no other charges of any kind are levied or exacted on vessels of the United States than upon British vessels, or upon the like goods, wares, and merchandise, imported therein from elsewhere; but in this elsewhere the British territories in Europe and the West Indies were not included. They, according to him, were not elsewhere, with reference to the ports of the United States, or, in other words, were ports of the United States. The Lieutenant Governor of Nova Scotia was more cautious. He transmitted to Mr. Canning statements from the officers of the customs, showing that, by the act of Parliament, no other duties of impost or of tonnage were levied upon vessels of the United States at Halifax than upon British vessels; but even this, according to a document accompanying these statements, did not include vessels of the province itself. They, by a colonial law, are entitled to a deduction of two pence per ton from the tonnage duty payable by British vessels, according to which doctrine they are not British vessels themselves.

I have explicitly assured Mr. Canning that the proclamation of the President, authorized by the third section of the act of Congress of March 1, 1823, cannot be issued without a declaration pledging the faith of the British Government that, upon the vessels of the United States admitted into all and every one of the enumerated ports, and upon any goods, wares, or merchandise, imported therein in the said vessels, no other or higher duties of tonnage or impost, and no other charges of any kind are levied or exacted, than upon all British vessels, (including all vessels of the colonies themselves,) or upon the like goods, wares, or merchandise, imported into the said colonial ports from anywhere, including Great Britain and the other British colonies themselves; and that, until such proof shall be given, British vessels and their cargoes coming from the colonies of the United States must continue to pay our foreign tonnage, and ten per cemt. additional impost duties. Notice of this has been given by Mr. Canning to the British Consuls in a letter which has been published, and which you will find in one of the newspapers herewith sent, (National Intelligencer of May 29, 1823.) By the respective regulation of the two countries the present condition of the trade is as follows:

The intercourse between the ports of the United States and the enumerated colonial ports is open to the vessels of both parties.

By the British regulations American vessels are admitted into the enumerated ports only direct from the United States. They are allowed to import only certain enumerated articles.	British vessels are admitted into the enumerated ports, and others, without restriction.
Upon all the important articles of this list a duty equivalent to ten per cent. ad valorem is imposed.
If they take return cargoes, they must give export bonds for landing them in the port or ports of the United States, for which only they can clear out. And in most, if not all, of the West India colonies	They may enter direct from the United States, or from any other port of America, or from the British possessions in Europe. They are allowed to import not only the enumerated articles, but all others not entirely prohibited; and among the articles, the exclusive carriage of which is reserved to them, are articles of the first ne-they pay an export duty of from four to five per cent. ad valorem.

By the American regulations British vessels from the enumerated ports are admitted, if laden, into the the United States only with cargoes of colonial produce.

They are allowed to take return cargoes only direct to the enumerated ports.

They pay the foreign tonnage duty of ninety-four cents per ton, and the foreign ten per cent. additional impost on their cargoes.

cessity to the colonies and staple exports from the United States, on the important articles which, in common with the vessels of the United States, they may import direct from the United States; if they do so import them, the ten per cent. duty ad valorem must be paid. But they may import the like articles from Great Britain or from the North American to the West India colonies duty free; they are liable to no export bond; may trade between colony and colony; may export cargoes for any part of the British dominions in Europe or America and pay no export duty, nor unless they choose to return to the United States.

American vessels may bring from the enumerated ports any articles the exportation of which from those ports is permitted by the British laws.

They are in no case compelled to return to the enumerated ports.

They are exempt from the foreign tonnage and additional impost duties.

"It is impossible to take this comparative view of the respective exemptions and restrictions operating on the vessels of the two countries employed in the same trade without perceiving that the balance of advantage is highly in favor of the British and against the American navigation, and that the United States could not consent to equalize the tonnage and impost duties without surrendering the whole trade to the British shipping, and defeating the object for which both our navigation acts of 1818 and 1820 were provided."

"Throughout the whole course of these modifications of the old British navigation act of Charles II, offered us by the acts of 24th June and 5th August, 1822, the admission of our vessels to the British West India colonies has been presented to us not only upon conditions excessively burdensome, but under a direct menace that if we should not accept it upon the identical terms offered in those acts, all commercial intercourse between us and all the British colonies in this hemisphere would be prohibited by an order in council. And we have received frequent intimations that this power, reserved to the King by the act of the 24th of June, would be exercised if we should not immediately exempt British vessels employed in the trade from the foreign tonnage and additional impost duties, and place them, in these respects, on the same footing with our own. We have been, therefore, under the necessity of deciding upon our course of policy, relating to this interest, upon a calculation of probability that the power would be exercised, and that the order of council would issue; and from a full and deliberate view of this subject we have come to the conclusion that however injurious that measure, if resorted to, would prove to us, it would still be less mischievous than the total abandonment of our defensive system of counteraction established by our navigation acts of 1818 and 1820. We are also perfectly convinced that this would be the effect of our acceptance, unconditional, of the intercourse as prescribed by the act of Parliament of June 24, 1822, and particularly of releasing the British shipping employed in the trade from the foreign tonnage and impost duties. The act of Congress has provided that if the British order prohibiting the trade and intercourse in our vessels with any of the enumerated ports, under the authority of the act of Parliament, should be issued, from the day of the date of the order in council, or from the time of its commencing to be in operation, our two navigation acts should revive and be in full force. This measure, on our part, is merely defensive; but we think we have some reason to complain, if not of harshness, at least of a proceeding somewhat peremptory in the mode of opening to us the West India colonial ports. They are opened to us, as I have shown, upon terms which we had effectively rejected in negotiation, and which we could not possibly accept without surrendering the whole navigation interest for which we have so long contended. They are open to us, subject to a total interdiction of the commerce at the discretion of the King, by an order in council, without an hour's notice to those of our citizens whose interest may be affected by it. There is also some obscurity in the phraseology of the 15th section of the act of Parliament of the 24th June, 1822, leaving us in doubt what the condition of our intercourse would be with any colony concerning which the prohibitory order in council might issue. It says that on the contingency prescribed it shall be lawful for the King, by order in council, to prohibit trade and intercourse, under the authority of this act, with any country, &c.; and that if such order in council shall issue, 'then, during the time that such order in council shall be in force, none of the provisions of this act, either as respects the law herein repealed or to any other provisions of this act, shall apply or be taken to apply to any country or State, the trade with which, under the provisions of this act, shall be prohibited by any such order of his Majesty in council.' But the provisions of this act, as respects the laws repealed in it, are no other than the repeal of them itself; and if, by virtue of the prohibitory order in council, none of the provisions of this act, as respects the laws repealed in it, shall apply or be taken to apply, the conclusion would seem to be that those laws would not be repealed; that is, that they would again revive and be in force with regard to the country, the trade with which, 'under the authority of this act,' should be prohibited by the order in council. But some of these laws repealed are laws authorizing trade and intercourse in vessels of the United States with the colonies of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Bermuda, and the Bahama islands; and if, by the prohibitory order in council, the provisions as respects those laws in the act of 3d George IV, chapter 44, should cease to apply, it would follow that the trade and intercourse under them would again be authorized, and its condition would be precisely the same as if that act of Parliament had not been made. All this would be very clear and unequivocal but for the remaining part of the paragraph in the same 15th section of the act which says that 'if any goods whatever shall be imported from, or shipped for the purpose of being exported to, any such country or island in America or the West Indies in any foreign ship or vessel, after trade and intercourse therewith shall have been prohibited by any such order of his Majesty in council, issued under the authority of this act,' all such goods, with the ship or vessel, &c., shall be forfeited. Thus the provisions of the section appear to be contradictory to themselves, and leave us in doubt whether it was meant that the prohibitory order in council would revive and reinforce the free port acts repealed by the act of Parliament, or would operate as a total interdiction of trade and intercourse in our vessels with the interdicted colony.

"You are authorized to renew to the British Government the proposal of continuing this intercourse, in other respects, on the footing upon which it is placed by the acts of Parliament and the act of Congress, but with a removal of the discriminating duties on both sides, and particularly that the duties in the schedule C of the act of Parliament of 3d George IV, chapter 44, and in the schedule B of the act of 3d George IV, chapter 119, on the part of Great Britain, and the foreign tonnage duty and additional impost upon British vessels, from the enumerated ports, on the part of the United States, should be mutually repealed. If this proposal should be accepted, it may be carried into effect by an act of Parliament, upon the passage of which the President's proclamation would immediately be issued; or it may be agreed upon by a convention, which you are hereby authorized to sign, and to transmit for ratification. A new full power is enclosed, to be used if required The act of Parliament, or the convention, should be explicit in the removal of all discriminating duties and charges, whether imposed by Parliament or by colonial laws, and it should apply to all the enumerated ports. Should the offer be declined, you will receive any proposition which may be made in its stead, for reference to this Government."

Mr. Stratford Canning to Mr. Adams.

WASHINGTON, March 27, 1823.

The undersigned, his Britannic Majesty's Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary, referring to the third section of an act of Congress approved the 1st of March, 1823, and entitled "An act to regulate the commercial intercourse between the United States and certain British colonial ports," requests the American Secretary of State will do him the honor to afford him information of the exact nature and scope of the "proof" which is thereby required to enable the President to issue his proclamation for the repeal of the discriminating duties still levied on British vessels entering from such ports of his Majesty's colonies as are enumerated in the first section of the act.

The undersigned conceives that, in his previous communications on this subject, he has already furnished abundant and satisfactory evidence of the intention of his Majesty's Government, long since carried into effect, to place American vessels on the same footing with British, in respect to the duties on import and tonnage, under the expectation of a strict reciprocity on the part of the United States; but, learning from the printed circular addressed, on the 17th instant, to the Collectors, by the Comptroller of the Treasury, in explanation of the act approved on the 1st, and but recently brought to his knowledge, that no authority has yet been given to dispense with the collection of alien duties on British vessels arriving from his Majesty's colonies, the undersigned is desirous of knowing whether any, and what, further communication may be expected by the President, under the act now in force, as necessary to the execution of the third section, to the end that he may either at once remove any obstacle which it depends on him to remove, or have it in his power to apprise his Government of the real state of the case in this particular.

The undersigned requests the Secretary of State to accept the assurance of his high consideration.

STRATFORD CANNING.

Hon. JOHN QUINCY ADAMS, Secretary of State.

Mr. Adams to Mr. Stratford Canning.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, April 8, 1823.

SIR: In answer to your note of the 27th ultimo, I have the honor of stating that any authentic declaration from your Government, communicated either through the minister of the United States in England or through his Britannic Majesty's minister residing here, "that upon the vessels of the United States admitted into the enumerated British colonial ports, and upon any goods, wares, or merchandise imported therein in the said vessels, no other or higher duties of tonnage or impost, and no other charges of any kind, are levied or exacted than upon British vessels, or upon the like goods, wares, and merchandise imported into the said colonial ports from elsewhere," will be received by the President of the United States as the satisfactory proof required by the act to authorize him to issue his proclamation extending the reciprocal privileges offered in the same third section to British vessels and their cargoes coming from the enumerated ports to the United States.

In the communications hitherto received from you on this subject, although "the intention of his Majesty's Government to place American vessels on the same footing with British, in respect to the duties on impost and tonnage," has been sufficiently manifested, they have fallen short of the proof required by the section of the act of Congress now referred to, inasmuch as they had not averred either that no other or higher duties are levied in the enumerated ports upon the goods, wares, or merchandise imported therein in American vessels than upon the like articles imported from elsewhere, or that no other charges of any kind are levied upon the vessels of the United States and their cargoes than upon British vessels and their cargoes, or, finally, that the intention of your Government, even in its most limited purport, has been long since carried into effect in all the enumerated ports.

The act of Congress requires that the reciprocity of burdens and exemptions should extend not only to the vessels, but to the articles imported in them. This has not hitherto been affirmed by you to be the intention of your Government. It is not doubted that their intention has been to equalize the charges, but it appears that in some of the enumerated ports discriminating duties have continued to be levied to a very recent date, and express information has, but a few days since, been received at this Department that a tonnage duty of two shillings and sixpence sterling, imposed by act of Parliament of 28th George

III, continued to be levied upon all vessels of the United States at Turk's Island until the 23d of December last, several months after your communications claiming, even before the meeting of Congress, a total removal of discriminating duties upon British vessels from the enumerated ports, on the ground that American vessels were admitted upon the same terms with British vessels into them.

The act of Parliament of 3d George IV, chapter 44, appears to have given rise, in several of the enumerated ports, to questions with regard to its construction, and not to have received in all the same solution. As an experiment to open an intercourse before interdicted by the laws both of Great Britain and the United States, its intention was received by this Government with a cordial welcome and a sincere disposition to meet it in the spirit of conciliation and of real reciprocity. But, for the regulation of the intercourse, as the consent of both parties was indispensable, so it was just and necessary that the interests of both parties, as understood by themselves, should be consulted. It seemed obvious that this could not be accomplished by mere legislation of either party.

An arrangement, by mutual understanding and concert, was proposed by this Government immediately after the act of Parliament of June 24 was made known here. Whatever is yet known of the operation of that act, and of the system of which it forms a part, has contributed to fortify this impression. An act of Parliament of August 5, 1822, (3d George IV, chapter 119,) in particular, already bears upon the intercourse between an important portion of this Union and the contiguous British provinces with a pressure which has excited the attention of Congress, and which a resolution of the House of Representatives, at their last session, recommends to the Executive of the Union as a subject for immediate negotiation with Great Britain. I am directed by the President of the United States to make the proposal, and to request that you would make your Government acquainted with it. Should it prove acceptable, I shall be happy to confer with you upon it with the view to the conclusion of a convention; or if your Government should prefer to treat of it in England, the powers and instructions necessary for the purpose may be transmitted to the minister of the United States at London.

I pray you, sir, to accept the assurance of my distinguished consideration.

Mr. Stratford Canning to Mr. Adams.

WASHINGTON, April 10, 1823.

SIR: The declaration which you describe in your letter of the 8th instant, as requisite to authorize the President of the United States to issue his proclamation for the removal of all alien charges at present exacted on British vessels and their cargoes arriving from his Majesty's colonies, I am ready to give, insofar as regards the corresponding condition of the act of Congress, an extract of the third section of which you have done me the honor to communicate.

British and American vessels entering the colonial ports, under the act of Parliament passed on the 24th June, are subject to equal charges on every article imported under that act; whether in American or in British vessels, the same, if any, and no other charges are levied. With respect to the succeeding clause of the same section, cited in your letter, relative to duties levied "upon the like goods, wares, and merchandise imported into the said colonial ports from elsewhere," I must request that you will have the goodness to inform me of the precise meaning attached to the expression which I have underlined, as, in strictness of construction, these words seem capable of bearing a sense completely at variance with a principal provision of the above mentioned act of Parliament, and one which it is, therefore, wholly out of my power to include in the proposed declaration. I might, perhaps, presume that the term elsewhere was only meant to signify other places, not belonging to Great Britain, in America and the West Indies; but the bare possibility of a more comprehensive signification being attached to it, makes me desirous of ascertaining from you, in the first instance, whether I am right in giving it, exclusively, that interpretation, or, if not, in what more ample sense it is to be understood.

In answer to my previous representations on this subject, whether addressed to you before or during the late session of Congress, you informed me that the President was not at liberty to withdraw the discriminating duties on imports and tonnage, to which alone I adverted, in consequence of his not having received from Congress the authority necessary for that purpose. In proof, however, that the intention of his Majesty's Government, long since communicated to you, has also been long since carried into effect, I have only to mention that a circular instruction, a copy of which is at this moment before me, was issued as early as the 3d of July, from the custom-house in London, to the Collectors and Comptrollers of the Customs in his Majesty's colonial ports, directing them "not to charge any higher fees whatever, in respect of the trade allowed by the said act to be carried on in foreign vessels, than are now payable thereon in British vessels."

By what authority the tonnage duty of two shillings and sixpence, mentioned in your last letter, can possibly have been collected at Turk's Island so late as the 23d of December, I am wholly at a loss to conceive, as, besides the operation of the custom-house circular, the act of Parliamant, under which you state that duty to have been levied, was expressly repealed during the last session.

The remaining part of your letter must necessarily be left to the consideration of his Majesty's Government. It only occurs to me at this moment to submit whether some more definite statement of the points on which you have expressed the President's desire to negotiate might not be attended with the advantage of leading to an earlier and more satisfactory decision respecting that proposal.

I avail myself of this opportunity to repeat to you, sir, the assurance of my perfect consideration.

STRATFORD CANNING.

Hon. JOHN QUINCY ADAMS, Secretary of State.

Mr. Adams to Mr. S. Canning.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, May 14, 1823.

SIR: I have the honor of informing you that, by the third section of the act of Congress of the 1st of March last, "to regulate the commercial intercourse between the United States and certain British colonial ports," the term elsewhere is understood to be of meaning equivalent to anywhere else, and of course to include all places other than those from which the importations into those ports may be made in vessels of the United States.

The views of this Government, with regard to a regulation of this intercourse in future by a convention, or by further concert between the two Governments, will, at an early day, be transmitted by instructions to the minister of the United States at London.

In the meantime it is to be observed that the circular instructions referred to in your letter of the 10th of last month, as having issued on the 3d of July last, from the custom-house in London, to the Collectors and Comptrollers of the Customs in his Majesty's colonial ports, directing them "not to charge any higher fees whatever, in respect of the trade allowed by the said act to be carried on in foreign vessels, than are now payable thereon in British vessels," did not, as by the import of the terms it would seem that they could not, remove any existing discriminating duties or charges, other than the mere fees of the officers to whom they were addressed.

That other charges and even duties, discriminating to the disadvantage of the vessels of the United States, have continued to be levied in several of the enumerated ports until a late period has been already shown; and, by the papers which you had the goodness to submit to my inspection only three days since, it appears that a discriminating tonnage duty is still levied upon the vessels of the United States in the ports of Nova Scotia equal to two-thirds of the whole tonnage duty which is paid in our ports by those British vessels which are admitted upon the same footing with our own.

I pray you, sir, to accept the assurance of my distinguished consideration.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

Mr. S. Canning to Mr. Adams.

WASHINGTON, May 17, 1823.

SIR: In acknowledging your letter of the 14th instant, which I had the honor to receive the day before yesterday, I must be allowed to express my regret at finding that the declaration, expected by the American Government as a condition of the removal, on their part, of alien charges from British vessels entering the ports of the United States from certain of his Majesty's possessions in North America and the West Indies, is meant to extend beyond the cessation of corresponding charges, as they affect the vessels of the United States in the open ports of the British colonies; the term elsewhere, in the third section of the act of Congress to which you refer, being intended, as I understand from your letter, to include even the British territories.

Such being the intention of the act, it is vain, for the present, to enter upon any discussion of the question which it involves; and it is altogether unnecessary to dwell upon the other points to which you have adverted, as this alone precludes, and necessarily precludes, my giving in a declaration such as would prove satisfactory to the President.

Suffice it, on this occasion, to observe that the discriminating tonnage duty, which you describe as being still levied on the vessels of the United States in the harbors of Nova Scotia, appears, from the papers which you cite, to be levied on the vessels of Great Britain also; and, further, that the limited acceptation in which you seem to understand the circular instruction issued from the custom-house in London, under date of the 3d of July last, is completely at variance with the statement which I had the honor to communicate to you as long ago as the 18th of December, on the authority of a letter dated 21st of October, from the Collector of the Customs at Kingston, in Jamaica.

I request, sir, that you will again accept the assurance of my high consideration.

STRATFORD CANNING.

Hon. JOHN QUINCY ADAMS, Secretary of State.

Mr. Adams to Mr. Rush.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, June 26, 1823.

SIR: Upon the subject of the admission of Consuls of the United States into the ports of the British colonies which have been opened by the British acts of Parliament of June 24, 1822, to a commercial intercourse with the United States in the vessels of the latter, it appears by the note of Mr. George Canning to you, 29th November last, a copy of which was transmitted with your despatch, No. 281, that the British Government have consented to receive Consuls at one port of the island of Jamaica, at one of the Leeward islands, to be designated by the Government of the United States, and at one port in the North American colonies, with an assurance that the British Government will reconsider the proposition which had been made by you, that Consuls should be admissible at all the ports opened to the intercourse, if any practical inconvenience should be shown, on the part of the United States, to the limitation of the number of their Consuls to three for all the ports opened by the act of Parliament.

During the last session of Congress Consuls were appointed, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, for the islands of Jamaica and St. Christopher's, and for the colony of Demerara. The commissions for the Consuls at St. Christopher's and at Demerara are the only ones that have yet been issued. It was perfectly proper that your note, claiming the admission of Consuls into the enumerated ports, should extend the claim equally to them all, but, in advancing this claim, it was not the intention, nor is it the desire of this Government to make appointments for them all. Our consular system, as you are aware, allows no salaries to those officers, and their only emoluments arise from fees levied upon actual trade in the port where they reside. No appointment will, therefore, be made at any port where the services of the officer will not be needed. The person appointed as Consul at Jamaica has declined accepting the office, and another appointment will shortly be made for that island. A certificate of consular commercial agency has been given to John M. Kankey for the island of Barbadoes. At the next session of Congress the President proposes to nominate the same or another person to the Senate as Consul for that island, which is one of those where there will probably be the most occasion for the office.

You will give notice of these circumstances to the British Government, and request that instructions may be sent to the Governor of Barbadoes to allow the exercise of the ordinary consular functions to Mr. Kankey until the regular appointment of a Consul, and that when a person so appointed shall present himself with a commission the Governor be authorized to recognize him in that capacity.

The suggestion in Mr. Canning's note that the admission of Consuls of the United States into the colonial ports is not considered by the British Government as a matter of mere reciprocity, because American Consuls are received in all ports of Great Britain, and the United States have no colonies of their own where a practical reciprocity could be exercised, as you have observed, admits of an easy answer.

The essential object of the consular office is the protection of the commerce, merchants, and mariners of one nation in the ports of another. Wherever the commercial intercourse exists the services of the consular office may be required; and if British merchants and mariners coming from the colonies in the prosecution of the trade open to both nations can avail themselves of the services of the British Consuls in the ports to which they come, we think it would be an entire denial of reciprocity to say that our merchants and seamen pursuing the same trade, and going to the ports of the same colonies, should be refused the benefit of like protection from Consuls of their own country there. If a British trader from Jamaica can claim and receive protection from a British Consul at New York, it is needless to say there would be no reciprocity to the American trader to Jamaica who should there be told that he might claim the protection of the American Consul at Liverpool.

It is presumed there will be no occasion for discussing this point with the British Government, and I have made the above remarks only to guard against the inference that our claim to the admission of Consuls into the opened colonial ports rests upon other grounds than mere reciprocity. But in the negotiation of a convention it may be proper to propose, at least, an article prescribing the manner in which the exequatur shall be furnished to Consuls generally. That they shall be delivered to them gratis we have a right of strict reciprocity to claim, because they are so delivered to all British Consuls in the United States.

With this addition you are authorized to propose the sixteenth article of the treaty of the 19th November, 1794, as a model for one to be inserted in the convention. But as it reserves to the parties the right of excepting from the residence of Consuls such particular places as each party shall judge proper to be so excepted, it may be necessary, if that clause should be retained, to reserve all the reciprocal right of excluding from the protection of the respective Consuls all merchants, mariners, and vessels of their country coming from ports from which Consuls of the other nation are excluded.

We are not, indeed, tenacious of the insertion of any article relating to Consuls into the convention; but, whether by convention or otherwise, you will not fail to insist upon the claim of admission for our Consuls into all the opened ports whence British vessels, merchants, and mariners coming to our ports may claim the protection of British Consuls here, and where, from the state of the trade, we may deem it useful to our citizens that a Consul of the United States should reside, and also that the exequaturs of all our Consuls in the British dominions should henceforth be delivered without any charge or expense to them whatever.

The British Government may be assured that we shall use the power of appointing Consuls to any of the opened ports for no improper purpose. But the right to consular protection is one of the ordinary advantages of trade in foreign ports which ought not to be denied to our countrymen in ports where they are admitted on the principles of reciprocal trade. The want of a Consul of the United States at the island of Barbadoes, for instance, has been exemplified in a circumstance which has recently come to our knowledge. That island was one of those from which Mr. S. Canning received, and communicated to me, a declaratory certificate that vessels of the United States were liable to no other or higher duties and fees than British vessels coming from the United States. We are now informed that a citizen of the United States, who went to Barbadoes with a cargo of flour, was compelled, in December last, to pay a duty of two per centum on the proceeds of the sales of his cargo, under the denomination of a transient tax, which no British subject would have been required to pay. We understand that the American himself would have escaped this tax if his cargo had been consigned to an established commercial house in the island. But it is one of the many modes of levying discriminating duties which cannot comport with the principle of real reciprocity. If a tax of two per centum is exacted from the foreign trader for the privilege of transacting his own business, which the native trader enjoys gratuitously, they are not upon terms of equal competition.

It is presumed that had there been at that time a Consul of the United States in the island this tax would have been remitted upon his representations; at least, he would have given notice to this Government of its existence. This circumstance, as well as the other fact recently disclosed and noticed in my letter of the 23d instant, that in Nova Scotia there is a deduction, in favor of the vessels of the province, from the tonnage duty paid by British vessels, proves at once the necessity that we should have Consuls in the opened colonial ports, and that of the most vigilant caution in abandoning, on our part, all discriminating duties favorable to our own navigation in this trade. Whether this subject is to be regulated hereafter by convention, or by corresponding acts of Parliament and of Congress, we are to understand explicitly that, according to our view of removing all discriminations, the system must embrace the colonial as well as the parliamentary legislation; and if, in any one colony, the vessels or people of the colony have advantages or preferences secured to them over other British vessels and subjects, it cannot be satisfactory to us to be placed on the same footing with the British, not of the province. If the provincial enjoys at home a discriminating advantage over the Briton, we cannot admit him here as a Briton unless our vessels are also admitted into the colony with the provincial privileges. All this is essential to real reciprocity, and to the removal of our foreign tonnage and impost duty upon British vessels and cargoes coming from the opened colonial ports for trade with the United States.

I am, with great respect, sir, your very humble and obedient servant,

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

R. RUSH, Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary, &c.

P. S.—The person appointed consul for St. Christopher's and Antigua is Robert M. Harrison, and that for Demerara, Edmund Roberts.

Extract of a letter from Mr. Rush to Mr. Adams, No. 10, dated London, August 12, 1824.

My letter of the second of this month will have informed you that the negotiations in which I had so long been engaged with this Government had come to a close, but without any treaty or other arrangement having been concluded on any of the subjects which had been given in charge to me. This is a result which I should lament the more did I not endeavor to reconcile myself to it by the reflection that I have earnestly, though fruitlessly, striven to render it more auspicious, and by the consideration, far more important, that, as several of the subjects discussed have been both of novelty and magnitude between the two nations, my Government will have the opportunity of being put in more full possession of the sentiments of this Government prior to the conclusion, or to the proposal anew, of any definite or final stipulations. The task of reporting to you, for the information of the President, the whole progress of the negotiation now devolves upon me. I enter upon it in the anxious hope that whilst shunning a prolixity that might fatigue, I may nevertheless omit nothing necessary to a full understanding of all that has passed. I console myself with the recollection that the protocols and other papers that will be transmitted to you will mainly delineate every material occurrence. From these may be learned all the formal proposals that have been made on the one side or on the other; but the grounds of them, the discussions by which they were sustained or opposed, together with the various explanations which the written memorials of the negotiation, wearing for the most part the character of abstracts only, do not indicate, these it becomes my duty to make you also acquainted with in every essential particular. It must be my purpose to fulfil this duty in the course of the present despatch.

It was my first intention to have made my report to you in the shape of separate communications, allotting a distinct one to each subject, that I might be able to follow, in this respect, the example of your instructions to me. But after the discussions were opened it was often found impracticable to keep the subjects distinct. More than one subject, or branches of more than one, would sometimes engage our conferences on the same day, superinducing the necessity of mixing them up in one and the same protocol. For this reason, and because, also, the British plenipotentiaries, in some instances, established a connexion between subjects where, as I thought, none regularly had place, and so treated them in our records in the manner I shall have occasion to describe, it has appeared to me most conducive to good order to present the whole under one view. If this unity in my report should not appear at first sight to be suggested by a view of the diversity as well as number of its subjects, it has seemed to me, upon the whole, to adapt itself best to the course which the negotiation actually took, both in the oral discussions and in the entries upon the protocols, and that it will become most intelligible, whether in its incidents or its general spirit, when exhibited as a whole. In the hope that this mode of making up my report may meet your approbation, I proceed, without more of introduction, to its proper business.

1. After the slave trade question had been disposed of, the subject upon which we next entered was that of the commercial intercourse between the United States and the British colonial ports in the West Indies and North America. Copious as this subject was found to be when examined in all its details, its mere discussion, I mean the strictly commercial parts, was perhaps attended with less difficulty than that of some others. It had been familiar to the past and even recent discussions of the two Governments; so much so, that, upon almost every point connected with it, opinions had been formerly expressed by both. When, at an early stage, the British plenipotentiaries said that, after the opening of this trade to the vessels of the United States by the act of Parliament of the 24th of June, 1822, it had not been expected by Great Britain that our foreign tonnage duty and additional impost would have been continued to be levied upon their vessels, I naturally replied that, to whatever other observations the policy of the United States might be open in this respect, it could scarcely be said to have been expected, as, upon at least two occasions since I had been their organ at this court, they had expressly declined acceding by compact to the very terms in regard to this trade that were afterwards moulded into the act of Parliament. Your instructions being precise and full upon this head, I caused them to be well understood. I recapitulated the history of the negotiations that led to the convention of the 20th of October, 1818, in all those parts of it which had relation to the question of commercial intercourse. I presented the review of all the legislative acts or other measures affecting this intercourse, as well prior as subsequent to that convention. On the side of Great Britain, the act of Parliament of July, 1812, the draught of the four acticles submitted by Lord Castlereagh in 1817, the act of Parliament of May, 1818, and the order of council which followed it on the 27th of the same month. On the side of the United States, the act of Congress of the 3d of March, 1815, (the legislative basis of their system of reciprocity,) the two acts, original and supplementary, of April 18, 1818, and May 15, 1820, concerning navigation; the act of May 6, 1822, with the President's proclamation of the 24th of August, founded upon that fact; to all these I referred in connexion, also, with the second negotiation of June and September, 1819, when the proposals again made by the United States for regulating this intercourse by treaty were again rejected by Great Britain. The deduction I maintained from the whole was, that the United States, with uniform consistency and steadiness, pursued a course in regard to this trade which aimed at putting it upon a footing of entire reciprocity; that they asked nothing more, but, in justice to their citizens, could be satisfied with nothing less.

To work out this reciprocity seemed, however, not to be an easy task, I remarked, on the side of Great Britain, whatever might be her desire. Her commercial system was of long standing, and, from its great extent, often, in no slight degree, complicated and intricate. It was marked not only by a diversity in its operations upon her home and colonial empire, but by subdivided diversities in its application to her colonies. In some of her West India islands, for example, there were export duties; in others, none. Some had port charges, and various other local charges, operating upon vessels or their cargoes, not recognized in others; but, what was more important than all, her ancient navigation acts still remained substantially in force, mingling their fetters with all her modern legislation upon the same subject. Her commercial and navigating system, whatever other recommendations it might possess in her eyes, had been rendered by time and her past policy deficient in the uniformity and simplicity calculated to place it, in these respects at least, upon a par with the commercial and navigating system of the United States. This broad distinction between the two countries was always necessary to be kept in mind, I said, in their commercial dealings, and, whatever explanation or excuse it might furnish to Great Britain for continuing the pursuit of a course which still moved, in many points, in subordination to her ancient policy, it afforded to the United States neither motive nor justification for giving up their claim to the principle of an absolute and perfect equality in all their regulations of trade with Great Britain.

This brought me to the true nature of the act of Parliament of the 24th June, 1822. I explained to the British plenipotentiaries that this statute had not, whatever might have been its intention, opened the ports of the British colonies in the West Indies and America to the vessels of the United States upon the same terms as were enjoyed by British vessels. The privileges granted by it to vessels of the United States were, that they might carry directly, but in no other way, from some port of the United States to certain specified colonial ports certain specified articles of merchandise, whilst very high duties were to be paid on all such of those articles as could alone be the subjects of a profitable trade. British vessels, on the other hand, possessed the additional and exclusive privilege of carrying the same articles to the same colonial ports, directly or indirectly, and free from all duty whatever, when carried from a British colony in North America to a British colony in the West Indies. Moreover, I observed, the vessels of the United States, admitted only as above to the colonial ports, were obliged, supposing they contained a cargo, to return directly to the United States and to give bond, under a heavy penalty, for landing it at the port for which it was entered, with the additional burden, not imposed by the act of Parliament, but existing in fact, of paying a colonial export duty of four or five per cent. upon the value of this return cargo. This burden did not fall equally upon British vessels, as they might avoid it by going, which they were free to do, to any port of the British dominions, either in Europe or America—a range not allowed to the vessels of the United States. Nor were the British vessels required to give any export bond for landing the articles at the port for which entered, and producing within twelve months a certificate of this fact, a condition which was also attached to American vessels. It was evident, I insisted, from the foregoing recapitulation, that vessels of the United States had not the same privilege under this act of Parliament with British vessels, and that the former were also subject to restrictions imposed by the act, or otherwise existing, from which the latter were exempt.

I reminded the British plenipotentiaries, however, that no sooner had the knowledge of this act of Parliament reached the United States, than the President, exercising, without the least delay, the authority with which, by anticipation, he had been invested, issued his proclamation of the 24th of August, 1822, opening the ports of the United States generally to British vessels coming from any of the ports enumerated in the British act—an exercise of authority in a high degree liberal, considering the relative state of the statutes of the two countries then in force for the regulation of this trade. In other respects, the proclamation of the President had done nothing more, I said, than lay British vessels coming from the colonies to the United States under the same restrictions, in regard to their cargoes, to which vessels of the United States were subject when going to the colonies. This, in necessary justice to the United States, it was obliged to do, and by the permanent laws of the Union British vessels continued liable to the charge of foreign tonnage and impost duties. I explained to the British plenipotentiaries that if neither the proclamation nor the permanent laws of the Union imposed burdens upon British vessels and their cargoes, which were the specific counterparts of those imposed by the act of Parliament of the 24th of June, 1822, upon American vessels, they were, nevertheless, the necessary counterparts of the burdens which did, in point of fact, exist as against American vessels. To their owners it mattered not whence these burdens originated, so long as they continued to press unequally in the competition of American with British vessels. It was to complete the intention of meeting these burdens, upon a basis of reciprocity at all points, that the act of Congress of March 1, 1823, was finally and on full deliberation passed. Its express object I described to be to countervail all restrictions, of whatever kind they might be, in actual operation against vessels of the United States, whether enacted by the act of June 24, 1822, in force under the old navigation act of Charles the Second, or recognized and permitted by colonial ordinances or local regulations in any of the British ports that had been opened. As this act of Congress could not effectuate its just object by applying to British vessels restrictions which were of the precise and corresponding nature with those operating against the vessels of the United States, it adopted, I said, such as were analogous to them, without, however, in any instance, going beyond the measure of a necessary retaliation, but rather keeping within than exceeding this limit. The act of Parliament had, it was true, proceeded upon the hypothesis of extending like privileges to American as to British vessels; but here it had stopped without imposing upon the latter the same restrictions which had previously existed against the former. The act of Congress went further, and, in according the like privileges with the British act, imposed, also, restrictions equivalent to those that were really and injuriously in force against the vessels of the United States.

It was in this manner that I fully opened to the British plenipotentiaries the principles and views of my Government in relation to this interest. If I am not more minute in recounting all that I said, it is merely because I abstain from swelling this communication by a repetition of the principles, the facts, and the arguments contained in your despatch to me of the 23d of June, 1823. With the various matter of this despatch I had made myself familiar by frequent perusals of it, and it was alike my duty and my endeavor to exhibit it all to the British plenipotentiaries in the most perspicuous and impressive ways in my power. I went on to remark that it seemed plain, notwithstanding our countervailing restrictions, that we were still left at a disadvantage in the competition; for that, for an enumerated list of ports open to our vessels, only part of which, too, had been opened by the act of Parliament of the 24th June, 1822, we had opened all of our ports in return to British vessels. For an enumerated list of articles which we were alone allowed to export to the colonies, we received in return all articles which the colonies found it most to their interest to send to us; and, for a duty of ten per cent. on our articles imported into the West Indies, and of four or five per cent. on those that we brought away, our laws did nothing more than retain a foreign tonnage duty of less than a dollar per ton on British vessels, and of ten per cent. on the duty otherwise chargeable on the articles brought to the United States in them. It was even doubtful, I said, whether, under these circumstances, our vessels would be able to continue the trade, and it was perhaps quite as much so whether the double system of restrictions upon which it stood would not deprive it of all value to both countries. I used, under this branch of the subject, all the topics of illustration with which your despatch had supplied me.

The British order in council of the 17th of July, 1823, laying a duty of four shillings and three pence sterling per ton on our vessels going to the colonial ports, to countervail, as Mr. Secretary Canning informed me in October last, our foreign tonnage duty, having been subsequent in date to your instructions to me, no remarks upon it were consequently embraced in them. But I considered the duty imposed by this order open to the same animadversions as all the other burdens falling upon our vessels. If we had grounds for complaint before this measure, they were but increased by it. If we were deprived of the opportunity of fair competition in the absence of this new duty, its imposition could not but augment the inequality. If we were carrying on the trade under every prospect of disadvantage without it, a more positive and certain loss to us must be the result if it were continued. Hence, I did not scruple to say to the British plenipotentiaries that it must be considered as giving additional force to all our other objections to their regulations. I had not, I admitted, and from the cause stated, received your instructions upon the subject of it; but, as our foreign tonnage duty and the additional impost had been kept up against British vessels in necessary self-defence against all the anterior restrictions upon our vessels and duties upon their cargoes, I took it for granted that this new British duty, if not abrogated, would, on the same principles and from the same necessity, be met by some measures of counteraction on our side. In offering such comments as these upon it, I trust that they will be thought conformable to the true nature and objects of your instructions, though not in words pointed out by them.

In the end I offered, for the entire and satisfactory regulation of this trade, a draught of the two articles (marked A) annexed to the protocol of the third conference. The first of these articles, after reciting the restrictions upon the trade that existed on each side, and the desire and intention that prevailed of removing them, goes on to provide that, upon the vessels of the United States admitted by law into the colonial ports, and upon the merchandise imported in them, no other duties or charges of any kind should be levied than upon British vessels, including all vessels of the colonies themselves, or upon the like merchandise imported into the colonial ports from any other port or place, including Great Britain and the colonial ports themselves. And, reciprocally, that upon the vessels of Great Britain, admitted by law into the ports of the United States, and upon the merchandise imported in them, no other duties or charges of any kind should be levied than upon vessels of the United States, including vessels of each and every one of the States, or upon the like merchandise imported into the United States from any other port or place whatever. The words last underscored were inserted only for the greater satisfaction of the British plenipotentiaries, it being explained by me, and so understood by them, that it could carry no new meaning; there being no such thing under our system with foreign nations as a vessel of any one of the States distinct from a vessel of the United States, it followed that the passage would have had the same meaning without these words. The second article provided, in fulfilment of the intentions of the first, that the trade should continue upon the footing on which it had been placed by the laws of the two countries, with the exception of the removal by Great Britain of the duties specified in schedule C of the act of Parliament of the 24th of June, 1822, and those specified in the schedule B of the act of the 5th of August of the same year, and of the removal by the United States of the foreign tonnage duty and additional impost complained of by Great Britain. The article concluded with a mutual pledge for the removal of all discriminating duties on either side, of whatever kind they might be, from the desire which operated with the parties of placing the trade in all respects upon a footing of perfect equality. Such was the nature of my proposals, for the more exact terms of which I beg to refer to the paper which contains them.

The British plenipotentiaries made immediate and the most decided objections to the part of these proposals which went to the abolition of the duties in the two schedules indicated. They declared that under no circumstances could they accede to such a principle, and they proceeded to assail it under every form. The fundamental error of their reasoning, as always heretofore upon the same point, appeared to me to lie in considering their colonial possessions as part of the entire British dominions at one time, yet treating them as separate countries at another. For her own purposes Britain could look upon these colonies as on one and the same country with herself. For the purposes of trade with foreign States, she felt herself at liberty to consider them as detached from herself and forming a new and distinct country—as moving, in short, within a commercial orbit wholly of their own. It was to this that her rule, resolved into its true principles, came at last. However, such a rule might be met and its application admitted as between foreign States mutually possessing colonies, and therefore mutually able in their commercial intercourse with each other to act upon it, its application was manifestly unequal and incongruous towards the United States. Possessing no colonies themselves, the United States neither legislated nor acted upon a principle of subdividing their empire for any purpose of commercial advantage, or, above all, monopoly, with other nations, but held out indiscriminately to all one integral and undivided system. In strict justice, it would, hence, not be unreasonable in them to expect that all nations with which they entered into commercial stipulations should look upon their colonies, if they had any, only in the light of an extension of the territories and jurisdiction of the parent State, since this was, in effect, the aspect which the United States presented throughout the whole extent of their territories and jurisdiction to all foreign nations. The productions of Massachusetts, for example, which entered into the articles of international traffic, were, as compared with those of Louisiana, scarcely less different in their nature than were those of Britain from those of Jamaica; yet one commercial code spread itself over the whole of the United States, of which foreign nations, and Britain amongst them, had the benefit, whilst different commercial codes, and entangling commercial practices under them, were seen to exist on the part of Britain. This resulted from the mere fact, important it might be to Britain but indifferent to the United States, of these codes and these practices being applicable to the Government of different portions of the British empire, some of which fell under the denomination of her home dominion and some of her colonial dominion.

It was to no effective purpose, however, that I enlarged upon and endeavored to enforce by placing in other lights the foregoing distinctions. The British plenipotentiaries continued to combat my positions, and to insist upon their right to lay whatever duties they deemed expedient upon our productions going to their islands, in protection of the like articles exported to them from any part of their own dominion. They said that they would never part with this right, for which we offered them no equivalent concession. They likened our request for its surrender by an analogy, the force of which I could never see, to a request on the side of Great Britain, should she prefer such a request, to be admitted into a participation of our coasting trade. They alleged, also, that in laying these duties they had aimed only at making them a necessary protection to their own subjects in their North American colonies, and that they were scarcely up to this point was shown by the fact, which they also alleged, of their subjects in those colonies not having yet been able since the trade was opened to obtain a proportionate share of it.

I had, more than once, occasion to remark that it was not the right of either party to model its own laws as it thought proper that we were discussing; it was the terms upon which it would be best to do so that we ought rather to be desirous of settling. Here were certain colonies belonging to Great Britain on the continent of North America. It happened that some of them were in the immediate neighborhood of the United States. Their course of industry was the same, their productions the same. If the live stock and lumber from one of these colonies, from that of New Brunswick, for example, were allowed to be imported into Antigua or St. Christopher's duty free, whilst similar articles from the State of Maine, bordering upon New Brunswick, labored under a duty of ten per cent. on their importation into the same islands, was not, I asked, all just competition at an end? Still more was this the case, I remarked, if, after disposing of their cargoes, the vessel from New Brunswick could take in a return cargo, absolved from an export duty, and was, moreover, left at liberty to take advantage of circumstances by trading from colony to colony, whilst the vessel from Maine was obliged to depart in ballast, or, if she took in a cargo, do so subject to the export duty. How, too, under the weight of this latter duty, were the articles upon which it was charged to bear up in the markets of the United States against the competition of similar articles found in their markets, partly of their own produce and partly derived from islands in the West Indies, other than those belonging to Great Britain? It was thus that I endeavored to establish the reasonableness of our complaints and to recommend our proposals to adoption. I admitted the general right which every nation had to foster the industry of its own subjects preferably to that of strangers, but controverted its justice or expediency as applicable to the trade, a trade that was so anomalous in many points, and to be judged of and regulated, not so much on any general theory as under an impartial view of all the peculiarities that belong to it. As to the expression "from elsewhere," introduced into the act of Congress of the 1st March, 1823, I insisted upon the propriety of giving it a construction that would include the British colonies themselves as well as foreign countries, the only construction that ever could satisfy the United States, because the only one that could ever be equitable. Without it a reciprocity in words might exist, but there would be none in fact. There was obviously no foreign nation, except the United States, that supplied the British West Indies with the articles in which a traffic had been opened. To say, therefore, that they should be imported into the British islands subject to no higher duties than were levied on articles of the same kind coming from any other foreign country would be altogether unmeaning. The field of competition was exclusively in the North American colonies of Britain. These, by their position and all their local peculiarities, were fairly to be considered as another country in the estimate of this trade, though they were, it was true, in political subjection to Great Britain. Their being dependencies altered not those physical and geographical characteristics in them which made them the rivals in this intercourse, and the only rivals of the United States.

The British plenipotentiaries yielded to none of this reasoning. They admitted that there were many difficulties in the way of a satisfactory adjustment of the shipping question and of this intercourse generally between Great Britain and the United States. These difficulties were partly colonial, partly the result of their old navigation laws, and partly springing from the nature of the British North American trade, which bore so close an affinity to some portion of the trade of the United States. But they continued to declare their determination not to admit the productions of the United States into their islands upon the same footing with the like productions from other colonies of their own, and they reiterated their allegations that, even under the present duties on our productions, the trade was in our favor. They argued, hence, that the amount of the duties, instead of being too high, seemed insufficient thus far, taken on a general scale, to balance the advantage of our proximity to the West Indies, and of the greater extent and productiveness of our soil. On this head they gave me details. They said that by their latest accounts full two-thirds of the flour and lumber sent to their islands from North America were ascertained to have been of the produce of the United States, and that perhaps seven-eighths of this quantity were conveyed in vessels of the United States. On the return trade, also, they declared that our vessels had a share not much below the same proportion. To these statements I could only reply that my impressions were different; that it was true I was in possession of no returns subsequent to June, 1823, but that up to that period my information justified me in believing that the trade had not yielded a fair proportion of gain to our merchants. The British plenipotentiaries dwelt emphatically upon the circumstances of our vessels taking away specie from their islands, in place of a return cargo in the produce of the islands, as indicative of the trade being against the islands, since it left upon their hands their rum and molasses, articles which they were chiefly anxious should find a market in the United States. If it were the export duty that produced this necessity in our vessels to take payment in money for their cargoes rather than in the produce of the islands, the plenipotentiaries said that they could not repeal it, because it applied equally to British vessels. It was a duty of four and a half per cent. existing on the exportation of produce, not in all of the islands, but in some of them, viz: in Antigua, St. Christopher's, Montserat, Barbadoes, Nevis, and the Virgin islands. In the latter it was granted for the benefit of the crown in 1774. In most or all of the others it had existed for the same purpose as far back as 1668. British vessels paid it, they said, when going from these islands, whether their destination was the mother country or any foreign country; but I did not understand them to say that it was paid if they went only from colony to colony.

To the objection of only a limited number of ports being open to our vessels, they said that they admitted them wherever custom-houses were established; and that the privilege reserved to British vessels of going from colony to colony was only the privilege of letting them enjoy their own coasting trade. They seemed to forget that, by whatever name this privilege went, it was still one which operated against the competition of vessels of the United States. On the non-admission into their islands of articles that we desired to send, as, for example, salt fish, beef, pork, these, they said, were also excluded from the direct trade between Great Britain and the United States, including all other foreign countries. Here, too, they seemed to throw out of mind that this very exclusion, in whatever principle it originated, still operated against the commerce of the United States; for that a system of positive exclusion formed no part of the regular or permanent system of the United States, and was therefore one of which, as long as they dealt out a different measure of commercial benefit to other nations, they had good grounds to complain.

I am saved the necessity of recapitulating any further the remarks of the British plenipotentiaries upon our proposals, from their having furnished me with a summary of them in writing. This was not in the regular course of our proceedings, and the paper, not being considered as an official one, was not annexed to any protocol or referred to in any. It was merely given to me as an informal memorandum, in which light I was willing and glad to receive it, as it protects me from all risk of not doing justice in my report to their representations. It will be found among the enclosures, marked W.

After all that I have said, it may be almost superfluous to state that this Government will decline abrogating the tonnage duty of four shillings and three pence sterling imposed upon our vessels by the order in council of July, 1823. Mr. Huskisson expressly brought this subject before the House of Commons, in the course of the last session of Parliament, with a view to give full validity to that order, doubts having arisen how far it was justifiable by the provisions of the act of Parliament of the preceding session, on which it was founded. By this act a general power had been given to the King, in council, to impose countervailing duties on the cargoes of foreign vessels, but not upon their tonnage. It was under this act that the order of July, 1823, affecting the tonnage of our vessels, passed; and Mr. Huskisson obtained at the last session a new act for indemnifying all persons concerned in executing this order, which, though out of the words, was conceived to be within the objects of the first act. A copy of the last act is enclosed. The two acts taken together now give to the King and council a permanent power to meet other nations on the ground of reciprocity in duties, both as to vessels and cargoes. To this ground Prussia has acceded by a treaty concluded with this Government in April last, a printed copy of which I enclose that its terms may be seen. Denmark has done the same by a treaty concluded in June. The latter is not published as yet, but I have reason to know that its terms are the same as those of the treaty with Prussia. It does not include the colonies of Denmark, nor, of course, those of Britain, standing, in this respect, upon the footing of our commercial convention with Britain of 1815. Prussia having no colonies, her treaty, as far as there will be room for its operation at all, necessarily stands upon the same footing. Among the colonies of Denmark are comprehended Greenland, Iceland, and the Feroe Islands, which are enumerated as such in the treaty. It is understood that Sweden has shown a disposition to come into this reciprocity, and that there are pending negotiations between this Government and that of the Netherlands to the same effect.

After the British plenipotentiaries had finished all their remarks upon our proposals, I thought it best, seeing that they had not proved acceptable, to invite others from them, in turn, to be taken for reference to my Government. These they afforded me, and they are annexed, marked L, to the protocol of the sixteenth conference. The first article, after reciting the desire of both parties to abolish, reciprocally, all discriminating duties in this trade, proceeds to effect this purpose after the British understanding of it. It pledges Great Britain to lay no higher duties on our produce than upon produce of the same kind imported not from elsewhere, or from any other country, but from any other foreign country; using here the very term to which, in both the former negotiations, we had objected at large. The same term has place in the part of the article intended to operate against Great Britain, as she only claims, in sending her colonial produce to the United States, that it shall be received, subject to the same duties as are paid on articles of the same kind when imported into the United States from any other foreign country. To this correlative provision the British plenipotentiaries referred as illustrative of the true idea of reciprocity. I again insisted upon its manifesting the very reverse. It was palpable that the term had a real substantive meaning in the one case, but might as well be omitted in the other. Like produce with that sent to the British islands from the United States, the islands obtained, as we had seen, from no other foreign country, but only from the British possessions in North America; whereas the United States did receive from Cuba, from St. Domingo, and from other foreign islands and countries the same kind of produce as that yielded in the British islands. Surely, then, Great Britain would be benefitted by the operation of the term, whilst to the United States it must be nugatory. There was a visible sphere within which it would act in the one case, whilst in the other there was no shadow of foundation upon which it could rest. But I was always unsuccessful in obtaining from the British plenipotentiaries the admissions due to us on this cardinal principle. Their second article provides for the actual abolition, subject of course to the foregoing reservation, of all discriminating duties or charges of every kind, whether on the vessels or cargoes of the two Powers. The third contains a stipulation that, in case the trade should prove, on trial, unduly advantageous to one of the parties, the other will examine in a proper spirit the complaint, and, on its being substantiated, adopt measures in unison with the true principles on which the parties intend to fix it. The fourth provides that whatever advantages Great Britain may in future extend to any friendly State in Europe or America, with respect to this trade, shall be common to the United States; and that the United States shall extend to Great Britain whatever advantages they may, at any time, grant to the most favored State in any trade carried on between the possessions of such State in the West Indies or America, and the United States. The fifth and last article provides, in consideration of the foregoing arrangements, that Consuls shall be admitted from the United States into the open colonial ports, and received on the same conditions as are stipulated in the fourth article of the convention of July, 1815. Upon this last article I shall have occasion to remark in another part of my communications. The others I leave, including the fourth, upon the remarks already made. The fourth, it is evident, still keeps to the British principle of considering their colonies as equivalent, of themselves, to the whole of the United States in the arrangements of this trade. During the pendency of the negotiation I received a letter, which seemed to me to be of importance, from Mr. Kankey, our consular commercial agent at the island of Barbadoes. He informed me that, under directions which had been recently given to the Collector and Comptroller of the Customs of that island by the Lords Commissioners of the Treasury, vessels of the United States were permitted to land there a portion of their cargoes, and to carry the remainder elsewhere, if entered for exportation, paying the import duty only on so much as was landed. This regulation, he added, would be of service to our trade, provided the necessity of paying the tonnage money of four shillings and three pence sterling per ton, at more than one of the colonial ports, during the same voyage, could be avoided; and he appealed to me to have this effected. I immediately brought the subject before the British plenipotentiaries, urging the right of our vessels to an exemption from all such double payments on the ground of British vessels never being subject to double payments of tonnage duty in the United States during the same voyage, though they did proceed from port to port. I was asked if I had any instructions from my Government upon this point. I replied that I had not, but that I was confident in my belief that, under our laws, the fact could not be otherwise than as I had stated it. Mr. Huskisson then said that he would obtain the sanction of this Government for placing our vessels in the West Indies upon the same footing, in this respect, upon which British vessels were placed in the United States; and would undertake, in his official capacity of President of the Board of Trade, to see that the necessary orders were forthwith issued for the accomplishment of this object. Mr. Kankey made another representation to me, which I also brought before the British plenipotentiaries, as pertinent to the business in which we were engaged. He stated that an improper duty was charged at Barbadoes on the article of biscuit when imported in barrels from the United States, a repeal of which he had not been able to effect by remonstrating with the Collector. This article, when intended for a foreign market, is packed in barrels, such as are used to hold flour, and seldom contain, it appears, more than eighty pounds weight. But, without any reference to the weight, the Collector was in the habit of demanding, on every such barrel of biscuit (the cracker) landed at Barbadoes, a duty of two shillings and sixpence sterling, when by the true construction of the act of Parliament of the 24th of June, 1822, under which the duty arose, it was believed that only one shilling and sixpence per hundred weight ought ever to be charged. Of this heavy overcharge on a single article, which the exporters of the Middle States were constantly sending to the British islands, I complained in the terms that Mr. Kankey's representation to me warranted. Mr. Huskisson gave me an immediate assurance that my complaint should be attended to. He subsequently informed me that, in consequence of it, the officers of the customs, generally, in the islands had been directed, in all cases where such biscuit was imported from the United States in barrels weighing less than one hundred and ninety-six pounds, to charge the duty by the weight, and at the rate of not more than one shilling and sixpence sterling per hundred weight. I am happy to think that, in at least these two instances, some portion of immediate relief is likely to be extended to our trade in that quarter.

From Mr. Monroe Harrison, the Consul of the United States at Antigua, I also received a communication whilst our proceedings were going on, of which I apprised the plenipotentiaries of this Government. He informed that our citizens, trading to that island, being often compelled to sell their cargoes on a credit, payable in produce when the crops came in, found it convenient, if not sometimes necessary, to make another voyage to the West Indies in order to recover the proceeds of their cargoes so disposed of. The markets in the French and other islands being often better than in the British islands, our citizens in the predicament stated would find it, Mr. Harrison remarked, to their advantage to be able to resort to the former islands in the first instance; but this object they were precluded from coupling with that of afterwards calling at the British islands for the collection of their debts in the produce of them, since, should they only touch at the British islands, having on board any article other than of the produce of the United States, their vessels became liable to seizure. I did not receive from the British plenipotentiaries the same attention to this representation that was shown in the other cases; nor, under my present lights, did I feel altogether warranted in pressing it upon the same grounds. They informed me, in the course of our conversation upon it, that there was no objection, under the British regulations, to a vessel of the United States bound from one of our ports to any island in the West Indies other than British afterwards proceeding from such other island to a British island with the whole or part of her cargo, provided it had not been landed at any intermediate port, and that there had been no change in the property during the voyage. I presume that those of our citizens who are interested in knowing it are acquainted with this construction of the British laws, which, however, does not present itself to my mind in the light of any important boon.

ADMISSION OF CONSULS OF THE UNITED STATES INTO THE BRITISH COLONIAL PORTS.—My report upon this subject will be shortened by the communications which I have already had the honor to address to you at former periods in relation to it. I allude more particularly to my despatches, numbered 343 and 352, of November and December, 1823, and to my official note to Mr. Secretary Canning, of the 17th of November, 1823. In that note, written after I had received your despatch of the 26th of June, 1823, I found it necessary to execute, in a great degree, the instructions which your despatch contained. This Government during the negotiation, as well as when the correspondence above alluded to took place, always considered the subject of appointing Consuls to reside in their colonies as connected with that of the commercial intercourse generally; and here I agreed that the connexion was a natural one. It was evident that, but for the opening of the colonial ports to our trade, we should not have asked for the privilege of appointing Consuls to reside at them; and if, by any circumstances, they were again to be closed, it was equally evident that our claim to consular representation would be at an end.

The consular appointments made by the President for Jamaica, St. Christopher's, and Antigua, Demerara and Barbadoes, had been sufficiently explained and justified to this Government in the course of my communications above mentioned, in conjunction also with my number 349, which covered another official note from me to Mr. Canning upon the same subject. Nevertheless, I did not omit to bring before the British plenipotentiaries all the circumstances of this correspondence. They were particularly pertinent to our discussions on the question of commercial intercourse, which had hinged so entirely on the point of reciprocity, and throughout the whole course of which it had been the aim of each party to exonerate itself from any charge of deficiency in this important point, if not to fix that charge upon the other. I remarked upon the fact of our trade to the opened colonial ports having now continued for two years without a single Consul on the part of the United States having, to this day, been recognized in any one of them, though at least three of those who had gone there and presented themselves for recognition had been appointed under the previous and express consent of his Majesty's Government; whilst, on the other hand, during the whole of this period, the British trade from those ports had been receiving full consular protection from the consuls of Great Britain in the ports of the United States. In this, at least, it must be admitted, there was no reciprocity. Nor was the absence of it cause of mere nominal complaint on the part of the United States. And here I brought into view, from your despatch of the 26th of June, 1823, the practical inconveniences, especially in the island of Barbadoes, to which our trade had been subjected in the open ports on occasions which probably would not have occurred had Consuls from the United States been residing there. The British plenipotentiaries met this complaint in the manner their Government had formerly done. They said that when their consent had been given for appointing Consuls at three of the colonials ports, it had been given under an expectation by Great Britain that the United States would carry on the trade on terms that were reciprocal; but that afterwards, finding the terms to be such as Great Britain did not consider reciprocal, she forbore to perfect the appointments until the issue could be known, apprehending that the effect of new retaliatory measures on either side would soon be to put an end to the trade altogether. I rejoined that, whatever motive deemed by herself sufficient, though not so regarded by the United States, Britain might allege for her course of conduct in this particular, it did not destroy the broad fact, or lessen the evils arising from it, of Britain having enjoyed the advantage, during the two years of this trade, of full consular representation in the ports of the United States, whilst the United States had enjoyed none in the British ports.

On the principal question of the claim of the United States to appoint Consuls for the colonial ports, I took the ground which you had laid before me, and heretofore maintained in my note to Mr. Secretary Canning, of November 17, 1823, as well as in the one which I first of all addressed to him on this subject, on the 17th of October, 1822, namely, that our claim extended, not to any specified number of the colonial ports, but to all, without exception, that had been opened by the act of Parliament of the 24th of June, 1822. This was the ground which I pressed upon the attention of the British plenipotentiaries. It was the only ground, I said, which, in the true sense of reciprocity, and therefore in the true sense of justice, could be supposed to be satisfactory to the United States. As they gave all, so it was reasonable that they should ask all. The United States excepted none of their ports to which the British colonial vessels resorted from the residence of British Consuls, and had a fair right to expect that none of the colonial ports to which American vessels resorted would be excepted from the residence of American Consuls. Consular protection was an incident of trade which the United States did not feel at liberty to forego in behalf of their citizens, so long as they allowed it to be enjoyed in their ports, without limit or exception, by the subjects of Britain. It satisfied neither the real nor even the verbal meaning of the term reciprocity, in this discussion, to say that the residence of British Consuls in the ports of the United States was matched by the residence of American Consuls in the ports of Great Britain, in Europe. It was palpable that if a British ship, whether arriving from Liverpool or Barbadoes, received consular protection at New York, and an American ship received it at Liverpool, but not at Barbadoes, there was no reciprocity in fact, whatever artificial reasons might justify Britain to herself, in distinguishing, in this respect too, her colonial from her home dominion. The only true match to the privilege on the one side would be the extension of it to all the ports that were open, whether home or colonial, on the other.

The United States, I continued, in claiming to appoint Consuls for all the colonial ports, meant not to make an unreasonable use of the privilege, and so I was instructed to declare. But the privilege of selecting the ports must rest, I said, exclusively with the United States. Their consular system did not recognize any fixed emoluments as the standard of remuneration for their Consuls, but left it to depend upon the fees produced by trade. Hence, in the ports to which trade flowed Consuls were necessary, and to those where there was none it was not to be supposed they would be sent, or so much as consent to go. But, as the channels of trade were liable to shift, there was a manifest convenience and propriety on this and all other accounts in leaving the selection of the ports to the sound discretion of the appointing power. Such were my remarks upon this subject, in addition to those that I formerly made, orally and in writing, to Mr. Canning. I did not, in conclusion, offer any formal article in relation to it—first, because I thought it unnecessary after the aspect which the negotiation had assumed on the primary question of the commercial intercourse itself; and, secondly, because I had been informed in your instructions that the President was not tenacious of any article relating to Consuls being inserted in a commercial convention if one had been formed. But I gave the British plenipotentiaries fully to understand the true nature of our claim, and that it would not in anywise fall short of the privilege of appointing for all the opened ports.

They consented, substantially, to this principle, as will be seen by the protocol of the 24th conference. Their expression in it, that they saw no objection to the admission of our Consuls into their colonies, "subject to the usual exceptions and reservations," means that both parties were to be considered as reserving to themselves the privilege of excepting from the residence of Consuls such particular places as they might think proper. This they explained to be their meaning. The same reservation had place in the sixteenth article of the treaty of the 19th of November, 1794, which was pointed out to me by you as the model of an article on the present occasion had one been framed. It also exists in the fourth article of the commercial convention of the 3d of July, 1815, which article is indicated by the British plenipotentiaries as the model in the fifth article of their own counter-projet, annexed to the protocol of the sixteenth conference. The two articles on this subject, in the treaty of 1794 and in that of 1815, are so much alike that they might be adopted, indiscriminately, as models, the latter being a copy, with only slight variations, from the former. In my note to Mr. Canning of the 17th of November, 1823, I had reminded him that, in case Great Britain excluded American Consuls from the ports of the colonies, the United States would have to reserve the right of excluding from consular benefit in their ports all British vessels and seamen arriving from the colonies. So, also, I reminded the British plenipotentiaries that the United States would have to protect themselves, by a similar reservation, to an extent coequal with that to which Britain might use her option of excepting from the residence of our Consuls particular places in her colonies, there being no other appropriate mode by which we could countervail on our side this right of exception on hers, so far as regarded her colonies.

It will be seen from the twenty-fourth protocol that Britain continues to decline, for the present, receiving our Consuls in any of her colonial ports. She acts, in this respect, under an impression that there is danger of the intercourse between these ports and the United States being soon wholly interrupted. She waits the disappearance of this danger before she recognizes our Consuls, as its reality would, according to her way of reasoning, render their recognition of little value. It was in vain that I urged the justice of recognizing ours at once, so that we might be upon a par with Great Britain until ulterior events were known. If her tonnage duty of four shillings and three pence sterling per ton on our vessels entering her colonial ports, and her additional impost of ten per cent., be met by countervailing duties on our side, as I was forced, for the reasons given in another part of this despatch, to intimate my belief that they would be, her plenipotentiaries have informed me that it will lead to fresh measures of the same character on her side; thus bringing on a state of things that can only terminate in rendering the trade no longer worth the pursuit of either country. If, on the other hand, the trade remains as at present regulated, without any alteration by either party, although Britain, as I have had occasion to remark before, alleges that she is dissatisfied with it, she will let it have a further trial, and, in this event, will receive our Consuls on the terms mentioned in the twenty-fourth protocol. This she will do, as I understand her intentions, notwithstanding the tenor of the fifth article of her counter-projet above mentioned, which would seem to make her consent to the reception of our Consuls dependent upon our acceptance of her four preceding articles. I believe, moreover, that she would raise no obstacle on the score of expense, but grant to our Consuls exequaturs free of all charge, as we grant exequaturs to hers. This point I mentioned to the British plenipotentiaries, and to its obvious justice they took no exception. There remains nothing further for me to impart to you on this subject. The protocols that relate to it are the twenty-third and twenty-fourth.

Protocol of the third conference of the American and British Plenipotentiaries, held at the Board of Trade, February 5, 1824.

Present: Messrs. Rush, Huskisson, and Stratford Canning.

The protocol of the preceding conference was read over and signed.

In pursuance of previous agreement, Mr. Rush brought forward the propositions of his Government respecting the trade between the British colonies in North America and the West Indies and the United States, including the navigation of the St. Lawrence by vessels of the United States. On concluding the statement with which Mr. Rush introduced these proposals, in explanation of the views and antecedent proceedings of his Government, he gave in the three articles which are hereunto annexed, (marked A.)

The British plenipotentiaries, in receiving the articles thus presented to them for consideration, confined themselves to stating their first impressions as to the scope and extent of the American proposals and the extreme difficulty resulting therefrom, observing on such parts of the American plenipotentiary's statement as appeared to them to call for immediate objection or to admit of satisfactory explanation.

Protocol of the sixteenth conference of the American and British Plenipotentiaries, held at the Board of Trade on the 8th June, 1824.

Present: Messrs. Rush, Huskisson, and Stratford Canning.

The protocol of the preceding conference was read over and signed.

The British plenipotentiaries, after further discussion in relation to commercial intercourse between the United States and certain of the British colonies, gave in the annexed counter-projet on that subject, in reference to what had passed at the preceding conference, observing, at the same time, that the first two articles of the proposal communicated by the American plenipotentiary in their third conference with him had, in their opinion, no necessary connexion with the third, relating to the navigation of the river St. Lawrence, and that they conceived it would be more convenient to treat of them separately.

British counter-projet on Commercial Intercourse, (16th protocol.)

His Britannic Majesty and the United States of America, being desirous to regulate, by mutual agreement and on principles of just reciprocity, the trade now open under the respective laws between the United States and the British colonies in North America and the West Indies, have appointed plenipotentiaries to negotiate and conclude a convention for that purpose: that is to say, on the part of his Britannic Majesty, ——; and on the part of the United States of America, ——; which plenipotentiaries, after duly communicating to each other their respective full powers, found to be in proper form, have agreed upon and concluded the following articles:

I. The subjects of his Britannic Majesty and the citizens of the United States shall continue to have liberty to trade between the ports of those States and the open ports of his Majesty's possessions in North America and the West Indies under the existing laws and regulations of the high contracting parties. And whereas it is considered mutually advantageous to the subjects and citizens of both parties that all discriminating duties and charges reciprocally imposed and levied on the vessels of each nation and their cargoes in the ports of the other, as aforesaid, should be withdrawn and altogether abolished, it is hereby agreed that, upon the vessels of the United States admitted by law into all and every one of his Britannic Majesty's colonial ports, as aforesaid, and upon any goods, wares, or merchandise lawfully imported therein in the said vessels, no other or higher duties of tonnage or import, and no other charges of any kind shall be levied or exacted than upon British vessels, including all vessels of the colonies themselves, or upon the like goods, wares, or merchandise imported into the said colonial ports from any other foreign port or place whatever; and, likewise, that, upon the vessels of Great Britain and of her colonies admitted by law into all and every one of the ports of the United States, and upon any goods, wares, or merchandise lawfully imported therein in the said vessels, no other or higher duties of tonnage or import, and no other charges of any kind shall be levied or exacted than upon vessels of the United States, including all vessels of each and every one of the said States, or upon the like goods, wares, or merchandise imported into the United States from any other foreign port or place whatever.

II. For the more perfect fulfilment of the intentions of the high contracting parties, they pledge themselves hereby to remove, with as little delay as possible, his Britannic Majesty on his side, and the United States on their side, all additional duties of tonnage in the light of foreign tonnage duty, and all additional duties of import in the light of duties on goods imported in foreign vessels, at present existing either against the vessels of the United States and their cargoes admitted by law into any of the British colonial ports, as aforesaid, or against British vessels and their cargoes admitted by law into the ports of the United States, as well as all other discriminating duties and charges of whatever kind they may be, intended by this and the foregoing article to be removed and altogether abolished.

III. It being the desire and intention of the high contracting parties to place the trade in question on a footing of just reciprocity, they further agree that, in case any of the existing enactments on either side, regulating the navigation in this trade, shall, contrary to expectation, be found on further experience to operate partially, and in such a manner as to give to the subjects or citizens of the one party engaged therein a clear and decided advantage, to the manifest prejudice of the subjects or citizens of the other, in opposition to the intention above declared, each of the two Governments shall in such case, and according as the case may be, receive and examine the representations made to it thereon by the other, and, the complaints being fairly substantiated, shall lose no time in adopting such additional laws and regulations as may correct the grievance complained of, in conformity with the principle herein laid down.

IV. The high contracting parties being further desirous to promote and extend this trade in proportion as circumstances may from time to time allow, his Britannic Majesty, on his part, engages that whatever facility or advantage may hereafter be granted to any friendly State, either in Europe or in America, with respect to any commerce, direct or circuitous, to be carried on between such State and his Majesty's colonies in the West Indies or America, shall be in like manner granted to the citizens of the United States; and the United States, on their part, engage that under this contingency the subjects of his Majesty shall enjoy whatever facilities or advantages may at any time be granted by them to the subjects or citizens of the most favored State in any trade carried on between the possessions of that State in the West Indies or America and the United States.

V. In consideration of the foregoing arrangements, his Britannic Majesty consents that the Government of the United States shall be at liberty to appoint Consuls in his Majesty's open colonial ports in North America and the West Indies, and that Consuls so appointed on their behalf shall be received under the same conditions as those which are stipulated in the fourth article of the convention of commerce concluded in London on the 3d July, 1815.

VI. The ratification of this convention, &c.

Extracts from the protocol of the twenty-fifth conference of the American and British Plenipotentiaries, held at the Board of Trade on the 22d of July, 1824.

Present: Messrs. Rush, Huskisson, and Stratford Canning.

"The protocol of the preceding conference was read over and signed."

"It was agreed, in consideration of the numerous and complicated questions on which the conferences had turned, that the plenipotentiaries should meet again, and communicate with each other, prior to sending in to their respective Governments their final reports of the present state of the negotiations, suspended by the necessity of referring to Washington on some of the subjects that had been presented for discussion. Protocol of the twenty-sixth conference of the American and British Plenipotentiaries, held at the Board of Trade on the 28th of July, 1824.

Present: Messrs. Rush, Huskisson, and Stratford Canning.

The protocol of the preceding conference was read over and signed.

The plenipotentiaries, after communicating with each other, in pursuance of the agreement taken at the preceding conference, and persuaded that they had sufficiently developed the sentiments of their respective Governments on the various subjects of their conferences, separated under the circumstances which necessarily prevented, for the present, any further progress in the negotiations.

Paper on the Commercial Intercourse Question, from the British Plenipotentiaries.

The British plenipotentiaries present the following remarks on the articles of colonial intercourse proposed by the American plenipotentiary at his third conference with them. The first two articles have no necessary connexion with the third, which relates to the navigation of the river St. Lawrence; and the British plenipotentiaries are of opinion that it is more convenient to treat of them separately.

The proposal contained in the two articles on colonial intercourse is, in substance, as follows: The trade between the United States and his Majesty's colonies in North America and the West Indies to continue, as at present, regulated by the respective acts of Parliament and Congress, except that all discriminating charges on alien vessels and their cargoes concerned in that trade should be withdrawn on both sides; and further, that all articles of United States produce should be admitted into the colonies exactly on the same terms as the like productions of the colonies themselves or of the mother country.

To all but the last clause of this proposal the British Government are willing to consent. To that condition they decidedly object.

The objectionable condition amounts to no less than a stipulation that Great Britain shall renounce in favor of the United States, and without a return on their side, the power of protecting the staples of her own subjects by levying import duties on the like productions of a foreign country. In principle such a proposition is evidently inadmissible. It could not be entertained with credit by any power on which it was calculated to operate exclusively. It is directly at variance with the practice of all commercial, of all civilized States. It has no precedent in the commercial relations subsisting between the British dominions in Europe and the United States.

The specific grounds alleged in support of it by the American plenipotentiary are, in the opinion of the British Government, wholly insufficient for that purpose.

They are understood to be in effect: First. That American vessels are subject to an export duty in the British West Indies to which British vessels are not equally liable. Secondly. That, while all the ports of the United States are open to British vessels, only certain enumerated ports of the British colonies are open to vessels of the United States. Thirdly. That American vessels are confined to a direct trade between the place of export and the place of import, while British vessels labor under no such restriction. Fourthly. That the British vessels though confined to the same enumerated articles as the American in the direct trade, are not so confined in trading from colony to colony or with the ports of the mother country. Fifthly. That, while all articles of British colonial produce are admitted into the United States, many important articles of American produce are excluded from the British West Indies. And sixthly. That on those articles of American produce which are admitted into the British colonies import duties are levied, or, at least, that higher import duties are levied than on the like articles produced in his Majesty's dominions.

These several allegations are met in detail by the following specific statement:

First. The export duty complained of is a duty of four and a half per cent. levied in some of the Leeward islands on the produce of those islands, whether exported in British or in American vessels, and equally, whether exported to Great Britain or to foreign countries.

Secondly. The colonial ports opened by act of Parliament to foreign vessels from America are all those in which custom-houses are established.

Thirdly. The American Congress has passed an act confining British vessels to a direct trade, under bond, in the very same manner as American vessels are restricted by the British act of Parliament, and even to a greater degree.

Fourthly. The liberty of trading between colony and colony, as well as within the mother country, enjoyed exclusively by British vessels in this trade, is no other than a part of the coasting trade which every Government secures to its own subjects. The Americans enjoy a like advantage on their side, and the British are not allowed, on the same principle, to carry on trade between the several ports and States of the American Union.

Fifthly. The exclusion of certain articles of American produce, such as salt fish, from the West India market, is no other than what already exists in the trade between Great Britain and the United States, comprising other foreign countries. It is by no means peculiar to the colonial intercourse. The rum and molasses of the British West Indies are, in point of fact, but barely admitted to the market of the United States.

Sixthly. The protecting duties levied in the British West Indies on the flour, lumber, &c., of the United States are absolutely necessary to afford the inhabitants of his Majesty's North American provinces a chance of sending their superfluous produce to market on equal terms with the citizens of the United States. These latter enjoy great natural advantages over their northern competitors by reason of the open climate and comparative vicinity of their country to the West India islands. The sugar of the British West Indies, their principal export, has, besides, to pay in the United States an import duty proportionally higher than the duty levied on American flour in the ports of the British colonies.

On the specific grounds, then, alleged by the American plenipotentiary the above mentioned stipulation cannot be accepted by Great Britain without injustice to her own subjects, any more than it can be accepted by her on general principles without prejudice to her character as an independent commercial Power. Much as the British Government are disposed to cherish and improve the relations of commerce and good neighborhood with the United States, such sacrifices cannot, in fairness, be expected, even for the sake of those objects.

Still less are they to be expected when the statements of the British Government, in answer to those of the American, are fully borne out by the state, as hitherto ascertained, of the trade carried on under the respective laws of the two countries.

There is reason to suppose that about two-thirds of the flour and lumber received from North America by the British West Indies are produced by the United States; and it is not too much to say that even seven-eights of that quantity are conveyed to the market in American vessels, while, even upon the return trade, it appears that American vessels enjoy a share not greatly superior to that proportion.

Under these circumstances, the British plenipotentiaries can only accept the articles on commercial intercourse, tendered to them by the American plenipotentiary, with the omission of the stipulation already specified.

With every disposition to remove unnecessary obstructions from the trade, and to keep the protecting duties within fair and moderate bounds, no difference whatever being made in point of duties and charges between American and British vessels, whether belonging to the colonies or to Great Britain, it is impossible for the British Government to admit a condition which would expose their North American provinces to a total exclusion from the West India market, and that, as they conceive, without any equivalent concession being proposed on the part of the United States.

The British plenipotentiaries are ready, at the same time, to enter into stipulations, not only for removing all alien charges whatever from the vessels and their cargoes, as such, of both parties, in the United States on one side, and in the enumerated British colonies on the other, but also for extending to the United States, eventually, and in consideration of a fair return from them, any further advantages in that trade, which, in the progress of events, Great Britain may find it safe or desirable to concede to any other foreign nation or State in the trade between her colonies and its possessions. In making this contingent agreement, it would be the intention of the British Government to apply, in proportion as circumstances might allow, to the trade between his Majesty's open colonies and the United States, the same principle already adopted in the convention of 1815, namely, of placing each party, with respect to imports and exports, on the footing of the most favored nation; and in the same spirit there would be no objection to giving a suitable extension to the fourth article of the commercial convention respecting Consuls.

Mr. Addington to Mr. Adams.

WASHINGTON, September 7, 1823.

SIR: The act passed in the late session of Congress for regulating the commercial intercourse between the United States and certain of his Majesty's colonies in the West Indies and North America, as well as the correspondence which took place on the same subject between yourself and Mr. Stratford Canning, having been laid before his Majesty's Government, and received from them the most attentive consideration, I am commanded by his Majesty's Secretary of State to put you in possession of the result of their deliberations on that subject.

The act of Parliament of the 23d of May, 1822, is the first legislative admission of a direct permanent commerce between his Majesty's colonies and plantations in the West Indies and the United States in the vessels of the United States.

This departure on the part of Great Britain from her ancient colonial system was considered by his Majesty's Government to be mutually advantageous to both parties.

In furtherance of the liberal views which suggested this act, and in conformity with the principle by which the direct trade between Great Britain and the United States is regulated under the convention of 1815, the British Government, immediately after the passing of that statute, gave orders that no other or higher duty should be levied upon merchandise imported into the British colonies in vessels of the United States than upon the like merchandise imported in British vessels; and, also, that the vessels of the United States should be subject to no higher tonnage duties or custom-house fees, or other local or port charges, in those colonies than were paid by British vessels in the same ports.

These orders have long since been carried into general effect; and if, in any particular instance, it should be made to appear that they have not been punctually observed in any of his Majesty's colonies, the British Government would readily take measures for removing that exception, and for redressing any injury to which it might have given rise.

Contrary to the just expectations of his Majesty, no corresponding orders have yet been issued by the Government of the United States for the remission of the alien duties upon goods imported into the United States, under the pre-cited act, in British shipping, or upon the vessels in which such goods are imported.

For some time the Government of the United States declined giving such orders, on the ground that no satisfactory proof had been produced of discriminating duties being no longer levied on American trade in his Majesty's colonies; yet, surely, the direct affirmation of the British Government, that orders to that effect had been given, might and ought to have been received as sufficient proof of the fact.

As a ground for still suspending the remission of the alien duties, the American Government now allege that, by an act passed in the last session of Congress, the Pesident of the United States is restrained from taking off those duties until he shall have received satisfactory proof that "upon any goods, wares, or merchandise, the growth or produce of the United States, imported into the British colonies under the act aforesaid, no higher duties are levied than upon the like goods imported into the said colonies from elsewhere."

The term "from elsewhere" was at first liable to a dubious construction; but in your letter to Mr. Stratford Canning, dated the 14th of May last, it was finally declared "to be of meaning equivalent to everywhere else, and, of course, to include all places other than those from which the importations into the specified ports might be made in vessels of the United States"—his Majesty's dominions themselves, therefore, necessarily inclusive.

According to this interpretation, the United States claim the privilege of introducing into his Majesty's colonial possessions their own produce on precisely the same footing as that of the United Kingdom itself, or of his Majesty's dominions in whatsoever part of the world.

Such a claim, sir, I am commanded to inform you, his Majesty's Government consider to be wholly inadmissible.

For the expectation of so unlimited a concession, no part of the act of Parliament above cited affords the smallest ground. In that act mention is made alone and expressly of foreign countries. The third and sixth sections both specify imports into, and exports from, foreign territories as alone in question.

Considering this circumstance, his Majesty's ministers might, perhaps, have had a right to expect that a more early intimation would have been given by the American Government that the removal of the discriminating duties in the United States was to be made contingent upon a concession now brought forward for the first time, and of a character totally different from that which Great Britain had voluntarily offered and executed, namely, the equalization of duties in the British colonies.

It was but reasonable to infer that as soon as the deficiency of certificates, so long alleged by the Government of the United States as the only obstacle to that equalization on their part, should have been supplied, the whole matter would have been considered as definitively settled.

Such, however, has not been the case. The declaration required was given, and then, for the first time, the claim in question was distinctly advanced.

Since it appears, therefore, that his Majesty's ministers are now to understand that, unless they accede to a condition considered by them as totally inadmissible, the discriminating duties imposed on British trade will continue to be levied by the United States, it has become necessary for the protection of the trade and navigation of Great Britain, and for placing his Majesty's subjects upon a footing of equality with those of the United States, in the intercourse established under the British act of Parliament of 1822, that discriminating duties should be imposed in his Majesty's colonies upon the goods and ships of the United States trading under the said act, equal to those which are levied upon the goods and ships of his Majesty's subjects trading from the colonies to the ports of the United States.

The fairness, and, indeed, the necessity, of this measure, the United States themselves will, it is conceived, hardly be disposed to question. I am directed, however, to declare that, just and necessary as it is, his Majesty's Government will be ready to withdraw it immediately upon the manifestation of a disposition on the part of the United States corresponding with that in which the act of Parliament of May, 1822, was framed and carried into effect by Great Britain.

It is the earnest wish of his Majesty's Government to afford every facility to a direct commercial intercourse between the United States and the British colonies in North America and the West Indies, consistently with the principles of that act—principles in which they had hoped to find a cordial concurrence on the part of the American Government.

Within the limits of those principles his Majesty's ministry are ready to enter upon negotiation for promoting and extending that intercourse; but they cannot acquiesce in a system so partial, and bearing so unequally on the trade and interests of Great Britain and her colonies as that proposed by the United States, the principle of which has never been admitted by that or any other country in its direct commercial intercourse with foreign nations.

I have the honor, sir, to enclose for your information the copy of an act of Parliament, which, in conformity with these views, has been passed for the purpose of enabling his Majesty to resort to the measure above described. On perusing it you will not fail to observe that by it his Majesty is equally empowered to impose and to remove discriminating duties on the vessels and goods of foreign Powers, according as those Powers shall be disposed, or not, to act with a fair reciprocity towards Great Britain; and I am expressly enjoined to assure you that the power of removal will at all times be exerted by his Majesty with far greater satisfaction than that of the previous but unavoidable imposition of such duties.

I have the honor to be, with the highest consideration, sir, your most obedient, humble servant,

H. U. ADDINGTON.

Mr. Adams to Mr. Addington.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, November 11, 1823.

SIR: I have had the honor of receiving your letter of the 7th September, together with a printed copy of an act of Parliament enclosed with it.

In the month of June last instructions were forwarded to the minister of the United States at London to confer with the Government of his Majesty upon the subject of the commercial intercourse between the United States and the British colonies in America, to show that the terms upon which the act of Parliament of June 24, 1821, (3 Geo. IV, chap. 44,) had opened certain British ports in America to the importation of certain articles from the United States in vessels of the United States were, according to the construction which it had received, and by which it was executed in the colonies, so far from embracing a system of reciprocity, as the foundation of that commercial intercourse, that the Government of the United States could not consent to the admission of British vessels from those colonial ports on payment of the same and no higher or other duties in the ports of the United States than were paid by the vessels of the United States employed in the same commerce; to point out the discriminations to the disadvantage of the United States which operated upon their vessels under the system introduced by the act of Parliament, and to propose an amicable arrangement by negotiation of the whole subject in a spirit of mutual accommodation, and more to the satisfaction of both parties. By the communications recently received at this Department from Mr. Rush it appears that he had received these instructions, and had already conferred with his Majesty's Secretary of State for the Department of Foreign Affairs concerning them. A hope that the result of these conferences will supersede the necessity of any further correspondence upon the subject here induces me to suspend a reply to the observations in your note which might otherwise be required. In the meantime I pray you to accept the renewed tender of my distinguished consideration.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

Extract of a letter, No. 1, from Mr. King, Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States to Great Britain, to Mr. Clay, Secretary of State, dated Cheltenham, August 9, 1825.

"After remaining a week at Liverpool, it was recommended to me to take Cheltenham in my route, in order that I might use the waters for the benefit of my health. I found advantage by drinking the waters, and as Parliament had adjourned, I concluded to send my son to London with the despatches confided to me for Count Lieven and our minister at Paris, and, with the assistance of Mr. Smith, to make the necessary arrangements respecting a house, and other matters, preparatory to my going myself. I also requested Mr. Smith, who will continue Chargé d'Affaires till my presentation to the King, to ask an interview with Mr. Canning, for the purpose of explaining to him the delay which has detained me a few days at this place. Mr. Canning, being himself unwell, referred Mr. Smith to the under Secretary of State, Mr. Planta, to whom, accompanied by my son, he stated the occasion of this delay. The next day Mr. Planta informed Mr. Smith that owing to ill health Mr. Canning would not remain in town so long nor return to it so early as he had before expected; and by Mr. Canning's direction, Mr. Planta requested Mr. Smith to make this communication to me, expressing Mr. Canning's regret at the occasion of my detention, and adding that as Mr. Canning, on account of his own health, would for some time be absent from town, he would himself write to me apprising me thereof, and in his way to the north would meet me at Cheltenham or its neighborhood. Accordingly, upon the 29th of July, I received Mr. Canning's letter of the former day, and by the return of the post sent him my answer."

Same, No. 3, to same, dated London, 20 Baker street, August 24, 1825.

"Mr. Canning, as you will observe, is still in the north of England. London, I believe, is without the presence of more than a single Cabinet minister, his colleagues being upon the continent, or dispersed through the interior of the country."

Same, No. 4, to same, dated London, September 4, 1825.

"The Government continues in a state of abeyance. Mr. Canning is still in the north of England, and probably will not return till the middle of the month."

"Mr. Canning and colleagues are all out of town, but are expected on the 17th or 20th."

Same, No. 7, to same, dated London, September 26, 1825.

[Extract.]

"Mr. Canning has invited me to meet him at half past 2 o'clock, which will constitute our first meeting in London."

Mr. Clay to Mr. Gallatin.

JUNE 19, 1826.

"Your predecessor, Mr. Rufus King, purposes leaving London in the month of June, and on that account, as well as on account of the important negotiations with which you are to be solely charged, the President wishes you to lose no time unnecessarily in proceeding to Great Britain. On your arrival there you will deliver a copy of your credential letter to the Minister of Foreign Affairs, and, on your presentation to the King, you will communicate the original to his Majesty. On that occasion you will express to him the earnest desire of the President to maintain the amicable relations which happily subsist between the two countries; that, on the part of this Government, nothing will be omitted to preserve them in full vigor, and, if possible, to add fresh strength to them; and it will give great satisfaction to experience corresponding dispositions on the other side.

"You will find among the papers now put in your possession the personal instructions by which you will regulate your conduct. Mr. John A. King, Secretary of the Legation, to whom is allowed the option of retaining that appointment, and who will have been left by Mr. Rufus King in charge of our affairs, if he shall have taken his departure before your arrival, will deliver over to you the records and papers of the mission.

"In communicating the general instructions by which you are to be governed, the first subject to which I am to direct your attention is that of negotiation opened by Mr. Rush on the 23d day of January, 1824, and which was suspended on the 22d of July of the same year, with an understanding between the parties that it was to be renewed at some convenient early period. Owing to circumstances beyond our control it has not been resumed as soon as the President had wished. Upon Mr. King's arrival last summer in England he found the members of the British Cabinet dispersed over the Kingdom and on the continent. His Britannic Majesty was indisposed, as was Mr. Canning also. Mr. King has labored under ill health during the greater part of the time of his abode in England. It was not until the autumn that the British Cabinet assembled at London; and the first object which engaged Mr. King's attention was the state of the mixed commission at Washington under the tripartite convention of St. Petersburg. He was for some time occupied by a correspondence and conferences with Mr. Canning on that subject, until it was transferred to this city. Moreover, the British Parliament had recently passed laws affecting, in a most important extent, the trade of the British colonies in our neighborhood, the interpretation and practical operation of which it was desirable to test by some experience. These explanations of the causes of the delay which has arisen in the resumption of Mr. Rush's negotiation may be made, if you shall find them necessary, to the British Government. That of the United States has not been indifferent to the deep interests, and to the harmony between the two countries, which are involved in the negotiation. And it is satisfactory to reflect that no prejudice to either party is believed to have accrued from the lapse of time, which, on the contrary, will have afforded to both a more ample opportunity of deliberately reviewing the past, and of entering again upon the negotiations under better lights, and with a spirit of mutual conciliation and concession, the best pledge for bringing them to a fortunate conclusion.

"We have received information that Mr. Huskisson and Mr. Addington, formerly the British Chargé d'Affaires at Washington, have been named to conduct the negotiation on the part of the British Government, which has intimated an expectation that, on our side, there would also be two Commissioners. In not conforming to that expectation no disrespect is intended to the British Government. It belongs to every nation to determine for itself what shall be the number, and to designate the particular individuals to whom it chooses to commit the conduct of its foreign negotiations. Nor has the practice been uniform to employ the same number on each side. Great Britain does not, indeed, insist upon the appointment of two as a matter of usage or of right. In appointing you alone, this Government is influenced by the confidence which it reposes in you, and by considerations of economy and expediency."

"4. The trade between the United States and the British American colonies.

"You will recollect that the British Government declined treating on this subject in the negotiation which resulted in the convention of 1815. That convention left each party at liberty, by his separate acts, to regulate the trade according to the view which he might entertain of his own interests and policy. Accordingly, the Government of each has since adopted various measures, which have so restricted and embarrassed the intercourse between the United States and the British colonies that it is almost impossible to comprehend them, and the officers of the British Government have not concurred in the construction of the last act of the British Parliament in relation to the subject. This act has been differently interpreted, both in the same British port and in different British ports. A principal object of those measures has been, on the British side, to secure and perpetuate a monopoly of the navigation concerned in the trade, and, on ours, to obtain a fair and equal participation of it on terms of just reciprocity. The experience of both has been such that it ought to inculcate on their respective councils moderation and liberality.

"Mr. Rush submitted, in the progress of his negotiation, at the third conference, (see page 133 of the pamphlet,) two articles for the regulation of this trade, which were not accepted by the British plenipotentiaries. These articles embraced three leading principles: First. That there should be a mutual abolition of all discriminating or alien duties, so as to place British and American vessels employed in the trade, and their cargoes, on a footing of perfect equality. Second. That the productions of the United States admitted into a British colony should be subjected to no higher duties than similar productions of another British colony. And third. That the trade should remain restricted, as it then was, by the acts of Congress and Parliament, according to which it was limited to a direct intercourse. The British plenipotentiaries were willing to accede, in behalf of their Government, to the first and third, but not to the second of those principles, and they brought forward, at the sixteenth conference, a counter-projet, consisting of six articles, (see page 142.) On the 27th day of June and the 5th of July, 1825, the British Government passed two acts, the first of which is entitled 'An act for further regulating the trade of his Majesty's possessions in America and the West Indies, and for the warehousing of goods therein,' and the second 'An act to regulate the trade of the British possessions abroad.' According to these acts, the discrimination between Great Britain and her American colonies, as being subject, in regard to foreign nations, to different commercial codes, is in some degree abolished, and they are incorporated, to a considerable extent, together, and their trade thrown open to foreign nations. The legislation of Great Britain for her colonies has been very complicated, and we may not have a just conception of the provisions of those two acts. But if they are correctly understood here, they allow, first, that whatever may be lawfully imported into those colonies in British vessels may be also imported in foreign vessels into a specified number of ports called free ports at the same rate of duty for the vessel and cargo; secondly, that the foreign vessel is restricted to a direct intercourse between the country to which it belongs and the British colony, adhering, in this respect, to the old principle of her navigation laws. In some of their provisions, particularly in the imposition of duties on articles of American produce which was before free, (Indian meal and Indian corn, for example,) these acts operate more prejudicially to us than the previous state of the British law. But, notwithstanding, on a full consideration of the whole subject, the President, anxious to give a strong proof to Great Britain of the desire of the Government of the United States to arrange this long-contested matter of the colonial intercourse in a manner mutually satisfactory, authorizes you to agree—

First. That there shall be a reciprocal and entire abolition of all alien or discriminating duties upon the vessel or cargo, by whatever authority imposed, so as to place the vessels of the United States and those of Great Britain, whether colonial or British, concerned in the trade, upon a footing of perfect equality and reciprocity.

Second. That the United States consent to waive the demand which they have heretofore made of the admission of their productions into British colonies at the same and no higher rate of duty as similar productions are chargeable with when imported from one into another British colony, with the exception of our produce descending the St. Lawrence and the Sorrel. It will not be necessary, however, to insert the general waiver in the convention, but only to provide for the exception if that should be agreed to as herein before mentioned; and

Third. That the Government of the United States will not insist upon a participation in the direct trade between the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland and the British American colonies; but they do expect and require that their vessels shall be allowed to trade between those colonies and any foreign country with which the British vessels are allowed to trade. In agreeing to leave Great Britain in the exclusive possession of the direct trade with her colonies, the President is sensible that our navigation may be exposed to some disadvantage in its competition with the British. The latter may make double voyages, charged with mixed cargoes, from the parent country or from the United States and the colony. But the disadvantage would be so great as to render it impracticable that we could maintain anything like a fair competition, if British vessels, at the pleasure of their owners, were, and ours were not, permitted to share in the trade between the British colonies, foreign countries, and the United States. Perhaps Great Britain may ask, if we trade between British colonies and foreign countries, that British vessels should be allowed to export the produce of the United States to those countries, or to import foreign produce from them into these States. There would be some plausibility in such a demand, if it were confined to colonial vessels, and if there could be devised any adequate security against fraudulent denominations of British European vessels, bestowed to qualify them to enjoy the privilege of trading between the United States and foreign countries through British colonies. It is evident that without such a limitation, efficaciously enforced, (which is believed to be altogether impracticable,) there would be no equivalent for a privilege to all British vessels, European and colonial, of sharing in our trade with all foreign countries in the limited privilege to American vessels of sharing the trade between those countries and British colonies. Your discussions on this subject may take such a direction as to present a favorable occasion for testing the extent to which the British Government is disposed to carry the modern liberal commercial doctrines which it professes and has proclaimed to the world. With that view, and for settling at once all difficulties on the question whether the vessels of the United States shall be permitted to engage in the trade between the British American colonies and foreign countries, you are hereby authorized to propose as a general regulation, applicable to the British dominions in Europe as well as in this hemisphere, or wherever situated, that whatever can be lawfully imported into one country in its own vessels may be also imported into it in the vessels of the other country, the vessel and the cargo paying, in both instances, the same and no higher or other duties. This will leave the capital and industry of the two nations concerned in navigation to a free competition upon equal terms, and that is understood to be the policy which the British Government has recently announced. On this broad and extensive principle a treaty with the Republic of the Centre of America was concluded on the 6th of December last, and was subsequently ratified by the President, with the advice and consent of the Senate, it is believed, given unanimously. We have not yet heard of its ratification by the other party, and of course its promulgation at present would be premature, but a copy of it is now placed in your possession. A treaty with Denmark, embracing the same principle, under some modifications and limitations, was signed at Washington on the 26th day of April of the present year, to the ratification of which the Senate has also consented and advised with equal unanimity. Sufficient time has not yet elapsed to receive the Danish ratification, but a copy of this treaty is also confided to you. If Great Britain will assent to neither principle; if she insist upon engrossing the whole trade, not only between her colonies and her European dominions, but also between those colonies and foreign countries, to the exclusion from both of the navigation of the United States, it will then be necessary to insert a clause in the convention expressly reserving to each party the right, by existing or other laws, to restrict the trade between the United States and the British colonies to the direct intercourse between them.

"You will observe that the instructions now given respecting the colonial trade amount to an authority on the part of this Government to you to agree in substance to the modification of Mr. Rush's proposal, which was required by the British plenipotentiaries. You will endeavor to make a lively impression on the British Government of the conciliatory spirit of that of the United States, which has dictated the present liberal offer, and of their expectation to meet, in the progress of your negotiations, with a corresponding friendly disposition. The object of this part of your instructions may be accomplished either by inserting the articles respecting the colonial trade in the general convention for regulating the commerce between the two countries, which would be their most fit position, or in a separate convention. Whether the two articles proposed by Mr. Rush, or the first two proposed by the British plenipotentiaries, or others differently constructed, should be inserted in the convention which you are empowered to conclude, will depend upon the footing on which you may ultimately agree, under your instructions, to place the colonial trade. If you should not be likely to bring your negotiations on the entire subject of the commerce between the two countries and their respective territories to a conclusion in time to present the convention, in which it is expected they will issue, to Congress during its next session, it will be desirable, and you are accordingly directed, to endeavor to make a separate arrangement of the colonial question, so as to enable the President at least to present that before the adjournment. As to the duration of any general or particular commercial convention to which you may agree, it may be limited to a period of about ten years; to which it is advisable to add an article similar to the eleventh article of our Danish treaty, stipulating that the convention shall continue in force beyond the particular period agreed upon until one party notifies the other, in writing, of his desire to put an end to it."

Mr. Gallatin to Mr. Canning.

62 Upper Seymour Street, August 26, 1826.

The undersigned, Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States of America, had not seen the order in council, of the 27th of July last, on the day (the 17th instant) when he had the honor of an interview with Mr. Canning, his Majesty's principal Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs.

Had he then been aware of the precise import of the order in question, and of the provisions of the several acts of Paliament to which it refers, the undersigned would have thought it his duty to make the observations to which he now begs leave to call Mr. Canning's attention.

It appears that his Majesty's Government was vested with two distinct authorities applicable to the intercourse between his Majesty's colonies and the United States.

By the 4th section of the act of Parliament of the 5th July, 1825, it was enacted that the privileges granted by the law of navigation to foreign ships to trade with the British possessions abroad should be limited, with respect to countries not having colonial possessions, to the vessels of such as should place the commerce and navigation of Great Britain, and of her possessions abroad, upon the footing of the most favored nation, unless his Majesty, by his order in council, should in any case deem it expedient to grant the whole, or any part of such privileges, to the ships of any foreign country, although the said conditions should not in all respects be fulfilled by such country.

And by two other acts of Parliament, passed in the fourth and fifth years of the reign of his present Majesty, authority was given to levy additional or countervailing tonnage duties on vessels, and additional or countervailing duties of customs on goods imported or exported in vessels belonging to any foreign country in which higher duties were levied on British vessels, or on goods imported or exported in British vessels, than on vessels of such country, or on similar goods when imported or exported in vessels of such country.

Both authorities have been resorted to in the order in council of 27th July last.

On the ground that the condition referred to in the act of Parliament of July 5, 1825, having not in all respects been fulfilled by the Government of the United States, the privileges so granted to foreign ships cannot lawfully be enjoyed by ships of the said States unless specially granted by his Majesty in council, the said privileges are again thus granted by the order in council, but with the express proviso that the said privileges, or, in other words, the intercourse in American vessels between the United States and the British colonies, shall absolutely cease on the 1st of December next, so far as respects South America, the West Indies, the Bahama islands, Bermuda, and Newfoundland, and, on some other subsequent days, so far as respects the British possession on the western coast of Africa, the Cape of Good Hope, Mauritius, Ceylon, New Holland, and Van Dieman's Land.

And inasmuch as British vessels entering the ports of the United States from the British colonies are charged with additional tonnage duty of ninety-four cents per ton, and with an addition of ten per cent. on the import duty payable on the same goods when imported in American vessels, a countervailing duty, deemed equivalent in amount, is, by the order of council, laid, during the time that the intercourse is permitted to continue, on American vessels, and on goods imported in American vessels entering the ports of his Majesty's possessions in North and South America and in the West Indies.

There is not, if the undersigned is rightly informed, a single act of the Government of the United States which can, in the view taken of the subject by that of his Majesty, be considered as not fulfilling the condition contemplated by the act of Parliament of July 5, 1825, as not placing the commerce and navigation of Great Britain, and of her possessions abroad, upon the footing of the most favored nation, excepting only the continuance of the discriminating tonnage duty of ninety-four cents per ton on British vessels, and of the addition of ten per cent. on the ordinary duty charged on goods imported in British vessels entering the ports of the United States from the British colonies. Both the measures embraced by the order in council, the countervailing duties and the discontinuance of the intercourse, are founded on one and the same fact, the continuance of the United States discriminating duties. And the countervailing duty, deemed equivalent thereto, which has by the order in council been laid on American vessels, and goods imported in American vessels entering the ports of the British colonies, was alone sufficient to place the British and American vessels employed in the intercourse between those colonies and the United States on the footing of the most perfect equality.

It does not belong to the undersigned to question the policy of the measures which Great Britain may think proper to adopt respecting the trade with her colonies.

He only infers, from the acts of Parliament passed on that subject during the last four years, that the intercourse between the United States and the British colonies in the West Indies, South America, and other places, to the extent authorized by those acts, is considered, by his Majesty's Government, as beneficial to those colonies and to the British empire at large.

With this conviction, and the only inequality supposed to exist having been removed by the countervailing duties, the undersigned has been unable to discover the motive for interdicting altogether, after a short time, so far as respects the British possessions in the West Indies, South America, and several other places, an intercourse beneficial to both parties, and which might, in conformity with the act of Parliament, have, if deemed expedient, been indefinitely continued with those colonies, in the same manner as has been done as respects the British possessions of North America.

Wholly unable, therefore, to assign a cause for the contemplated suspension of the intercourse in question, the undersigned apprehends that, for the very reason that the object in view cannot be understood, it may be misconstrued.

Having no instruction on a contingency which was not foreseen, he can at this time only express his regret that a measure which cannot be viewed favorably by his Government should have been adopted at the moment when he was authorized to renew the negotiations on that subject, and with a well founded hope, from the liberal tenor of his instructions, that an arrangement, founded on principles of mutual convenience to both parties, might be concluded.

It is well known that the delay in that respect was due to causes not under the control of the United States, principally to the state of health of Mr. King, which has ultimately deprived them of his services.

The reasons of the marked preference given by the Government of the United States to an arrangement by treaty, instead of regulations adopted by both countries, are sufficiently obvious. It is highly important for all the parties concerned, essential for the security of commercial or agricultural operations, that the intercourse should be placed on a more permanent and explicit footing than it can be by reciprocal laws, liable to be modified or revoked at any time at the will of either party, and not always easily understood by those on whom they operate. And the obstacles which have prevented the United States from accepting the intercourse contemplated by the act of Parliament, which could only be done in toto, and by complying with terms on which they had not been consulted, may, it is believed, be easily removed by modifications essential to them, and which will not, it is thought, be found inconsistent with the interest of Great Britain.

The undersigned has taken a view only of the general tenor of the order in council, and does not think it necessary to advert to some of its details. He believes the omission of a special mention of the trade with the British provinces in the East Indies, in that clause which makes a special exception as respects that with the British possessions in Europe, to be purely accidental. And he takes it for granted that it is not intended to extend the countervailing duties to the intercourse by land or inland navigation between the United States and the British possessions in North America if it shall be found, as the undersigned believes it to be the fact, that the discriminating duties of the United States do not apply to that intercourse.

The undersigned avails himself of this opportunity to pray Mr. Canning to accept the assurance of his perfect consideration.

ALBERT GALLATIN.

Mr. Canning to Mr. Gallatin.

The undersigned, his Majesty's principal Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, has the honor to acknowledge the official note of the 26th ultimo addressed to him by Mr. Gallatin, Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States of America, on the subject of an order in council issued by his Majesty on the 27th of July.

The undersigned feels himself greatly indebted to Mr. Gallatin for the full and frank exposition which that note contains of his own opinions and of those of his Government upon the whole matter to which the order in council relates, and for the opportunity thereby afforded to the undersigned for entering into an explanation equally unreserved of the opinions and intentions of his Majesty's Government on that matter.

It will be highly advantageous to dispose at once of a subject which stands apart from all the other important subjects which Mr. Gallatin is authorized to discuss with the British Government—a subject which is to be argued on principles, and to be decided on considerations peculiar to itself.

Mr. Gallatin will allow the undersigned to take the liberty of remarking that this peculiarity of character seems to have been overlooked by Mr. Gallatin in his note of the 26th of August. Throughout that note there appears to be one pervading error. Mr. Gallatin treats the question as if it had turned altogether on this single point: "what are the equal and reciprocal conditions under which a trade between the United States and the British West India colonies should be carried on?" assuming, as a sort of axiom, that such trade is as open to the United States as any other trade in the world, and never inquiring whether some compensation might not be due from the United States to Great Britain for the concession of a privilege which it is her undoubted right to give or withhold.

The undersigned is prepared to show that, even if the liberty to trade with the British West India colonies were gratuitously conceded by England to the United States, still the footing on which the trade so permitted is now carried on by the United States is unequal and unfair.

But as the objection which the British Government feels to the proposition for such partial equalization of conditions, as Mr. Gallatin's instructions appear to be intended to establish, lies deeper than Mr. Gallatin's proposition goes, the undersigned thinks it right to explain, in the first instance, the nature and grounds of that fundamental objection.

It is, as the undersigned has already said, the unquestionable right, and it has, till within these few years, been the invariable practice of countries having colonies to reserve to themselves the trade with those colonies, and to relax that reservation only under special circumstances and on particular occasions. When a relaxation of that nature has been dictated and limited by the necessities of the mother country or of the colonies, the foreign countries taking advantage of it may fairly aver that they owed nothing to the State which had granted such relaxation. They may even have felt themselves at liberty to decline to accept of a partial admission into the ports of the colonies, thus evidently opened from considerations of local or temporary convenience, unless they were allowed a general liberty of trade with those colonies, independently of such considerations.

The interdiction of the American Government in 1820 of any commerce with the British West India colonies until American shipping should be permitted a free entry into the British colonial ports is to be justified upon this ground.

The obvious way of meeting that interdiction by Great Britain would have been to open to other commercial and maritime Powers the trade refused by the United States.

Circumstances, not necessary to be detailed here, rendered that expedient at that time unadvisable.

In 1822 the privilege of trading with the British West Indies was conceded to the shipping of the United States, with certain restrictions and limitations under which they were content to enjoy it; but that privilege Great Britain still withheld from all the Powers of Europe.

The concession to the United States was in effect, if not in words, exclusive; for the new countries of America (not then recognized by his Majesty) had no commerce or navigation which could interfere with those of the United States.

It cannot, however, be supposed, it is not affirmed by Mr. Gallatin, that, by granting the privilege thus, in effect, exclusively to the United States in the first instance, Great Britain precluded herself from extending it to other nations whenever the course of events should create a favorable occasion for doing so. Events which intervened between 1822 and 1825 created such an occasion.

As little can it be supposed that, because Great Britain submitted, at a moment of necessity, to terms which, though not unjust, were inconvenient to her, she bound herself to continue to submit to them when that necessity should have passed away.

Scarcity may justify the demand for a high price, and monopoly may give the power of exacting it; but there is surely no understood compact between the buyer and the seller that the former shall not endeavor to make himself independent of the latter by opening the market to general competition.

These obvious and simple considerations led to the act of Parliament of 1825.

Our right either to open the ports of our colonies or to keep them closed as might suit our own convenience; our right to grant the indulgence of a trade with those colonies to foreign Powers, wholly or partially, unconditionally or conditionally, as we might think proper, and, if conditionally, on what conditions we pleased, was clear. We were not bound by any engagement to continue a monopoly of such indulgence to one foreign Power against another. We had for three years felt the inconvenience of such monopoly. We naturally sought, therefore, in our new measure, to avoid the recurrence of the like inconvenience, by making our indulgence general to all nations, and, in order to keep the regulation of that indulgence in our own hands, we granted it by spontaneous legislation and not by positive treaty.

The question is now, therefore, no longer what it was in 1820 or 1822, a question between Great Britain and the United States of America; it is a question between Great Britain and all the nations of the Old and the New World, to all of whom Great Britain has tendered access to her colonies on conditions which many of them have practically accepted, and more perhaps are ready to accept.

Having thus placed (as he hopes) in a clear light the general principles of colonial trade and the principles and considerations upon which Great Britain has acted in respect to her own West India colonies, the undersigned now proceeds to consider the details of Mr. Gallatin's note of the 26th of August.

It has been already said that in the year 1822 we opened, by act of Parliament, a trade with our West India colonies to American ships, under certain limitations and conditions.

The United States were at full liberty to accept or to decline those terms.

In accepting them the United States imposed, at the same time, onerous charges and restrictions upon all British vessels which might trade between the British West India colonies and the United States. One of these charges is an alien duty both upon the ship and upon her cargo.

After ineffectual endeavors on our part to obtain the removal of this duty, we were compelled to lay a countervailing duty to the same amount upon American ships in the colonial ports.

Mr. Gallatin states "that, by the imposition of this countervailing duty, British and American vessels employed in the intercourse between the British colonies and the United States are placed on a footing of the most perfect equality." And further, "that there is not, if he is rightly informed, a single act of the Government of the United States which can, in the view taken of the subject by that of his Majesty, be considered as not fulfilling the condition contemplated by the act of Parliament of the 5th July, 1825, as not placing the commerce and navigation of Great Britain, and of her possessions abroad, upon the footing of the most favored nation, excepting only the continuance of the discriminating tonnage duty of ninety-four cents per ton on British vessels, and of the addition of ten per cent. on the ordinary duty charged on goods imported in British vessels entering the ports of the United States from the British colonies."

The arguments drawn by Mr. Gallatin from these statements are three: First. That the duty on the side of the United States and the countervailing duty on the side of Great Britain being equal, British ships trading between the colonies and the United States are as much favored as American ships in the same trade. Secondly. That, inasmuch as, with the exception of the discriminating duties in America, Great Britain is, in all other respects, treated as "the most favored nation," there is no just cause for the exercise, on the part of Great Britain, of the power of interdiction provided by the act of 1825. And thirdly. That, having in our hands two remedies for one and the same grievance, we ought at all events to have contented ourselves with applying either, but not both, by the same order in council.

To begin with the last of these three points, viz: the assumption that, "having in our hands two remedies for one grievance, we ought to have been contented with applying either, but not both, by the same order in council."

The only measure which is new in the order in council is the interdiction of the trade between the British West India colonies and the United States after a specified period. The duties on American shipping mentioned in that order are not new. They were imposed by an order in council in 1823, and have been constantly levied since that time. They are again mentioned in the present order in council only for the direction of the British custom-house officers in the West Indies, who, if those duties had not been mentioned as still existing, might have imagined them to be superseded.

The history of these duties is simply this: On the 1st of March, 1823, a law was passed by the United States which directs an alien duty to be levied upon British ships and cargoes coming from the British West India colonies "until proof shall be given, to the satisfaction of the President of the United States, that no other or higher duties of tonnage or impost, and no other charges of any kind are exacted in the British colonial ports upon the vessels of the United States, and upon any goods, wares, or merchandise therein imported from the United States, than upon British vessels entering the same ports, and upon the like goods, wares, and merchandise imported in such vessels FROM ELSEWHERE."

The British Government at first misapprehended the import of the term "from elsewhere," conceiving it to apply to foreign countries alone, and not to British possessions in North America; nor was it till after the interchange of several official notes between the British envoy at Washington and the American Secretary of State that the British Government was made to comprehend (or rather was brought to believe) the full extent of the concession required by the act of Congress, namely, that the produce of the United States when imported from the United States into the British West India colonies should be placed on an equal footing with the like produce of the mother country herself and her dependencies.

When such was at length ascertained to be the true construction of the American act of Congress of 1823, those countervailing duties were imposed on the trade of the United States by the British Government, which are now merely continued till the 1st of December next in the West Indies, and indefinitely in the ports of British North America.

It is to be observed that by the act of Parliament of 1822, (3 Geo. IV, cap. 44,) the British Government was enabled to interdict all intercourse between the United States and the British West India colonies under any such circumstances as those which had already arisen in the United States.

The milder measure of a retaliatory duty was preferred for two reasons: First, we were convinced that a claim so extraordinary as that put forward by the interpretation given to the act of Congress of 1823 would not be persevered in after explanation; and secondly, we had assurance that a full opportunity of that explanation would arise in the course of the negotiation which was then about to be opened between the two Governments on this, among other points, in which their respective interests were concerned.

That negotiation took place in London in the spring of 1824. On the part of the British Government an offer was made to arrange this matter upon terms highly favorable to the United States; but the American plenipotentiary intrenched himself within the letter of the American law, and declared any proposal inadmissible which was not accompanied with the concession required by the final interpretation of that law.

Things remaining in this state, and the British proposition having been unnoticed for nine months before the American Government, the act of Parliament of July, 1825, was passed.

The American Legislature had cognizance of that act from the commencement of its last session. It had also cognizance of the specific proposals offered by the British Government in 1824. Further, there was brought under its consideration, by one of its members, a resolution for repealing the discriminating duties.

The session, however, ended without the enactment of any law for repealing or relaxing the restrictions of the act of Congress of 1823, and with the rejection, after debate, of the resolution for the repeal of the discriminating duties.

To come next to Mr. Gallatin's allegation, that the discriminating duties are our only cause of complaint; that in other respects Great Britain is placed by the United States on the footing of the most favored nation in her intercourse between her West India colonies and the United States.

Mr. Gallatin, in making this averment, appears to overlook another enactment contained in the same act of Congress which imposed the discriminating duties—an enactment hardly less injurious to the commerce and navigation of Great Britain. That enactment, in substance, provides that no British ship entering an American port from the United Kingdom, or from any other British possession, except directly from the West India colonies, shall be allowed to clear from any port of the United States for any of those colonies.

If it is intended to be maintained that because the British act of 1822 permits only a direct trade between our colonies and the United States in American ships, the prohibition of a trade through the United States, between the mother country and her colonies, is therefore fair reciprocity; that position resolves itself in effect into the first of the three arguments into which Mr. Gallatin's statement has been divided, and may be comprehended in the same answer. It furnishes a striking illustration of the general misconception which has already been noticed as pervading Mr. Gallatin's note in respect to the character of colonial trade.

To allow a foreign ship to enter colonial ports at all, and upon any terms, is a boon; to withhold from a ship of a country having colonies trading from the mother country to a foreign State, under a regular treaty between the two countries, the right of clearing for another port belonging to that mother country in another part of the world, is an injury

That right has been denied to Great Britain by the United States, not perhaps in contradiction to the letter, but undoubtedly in deviation from the spirit of the treaty of 1815. It is a right which existed and was enjoyed before the treaty of 1815 was framed—at a period, that is, when no claim to any trade with our colonies had been even whispered by the United States—and it could not therefore be, by any just reasoning, connected with that trade or made dependent upon it. It is a right which friendly nations, trafficking with one another, are so much in the habit of allowing to each other that it is exercised as matter of course, unless specifically withholden. The colonial trade, on the contrary, by the practice of all nations having colonies, is a trade interdicted, as a matter of course, unless specifically granted.

It must not be forgotten that this enactment, founded professedly on the limitations of the British act of Parliament of 1822, is continued fourteen months after the passing of the British act of 1825, by which the limitations of 1822 were done away. Since which 5th of January, 1826, an American ship trading to a British West India colony may clear out from thence to any part of the world, the United Kingdom and its dependencies alone excepted. But the British ship in the American port still remains subject to all the restrictions of the American law of 1823, prohibiting a trade through the United States between the mother country and her West India colonies.

Mr. Gallatin, in his note of the 26th of August, states that "it is well known that the delay in renewing the negotiation upon the subject of the colonial intercourse on principles of mutual accommodation is due to causes not under the control of the United States—principally to the state of the health of Mr. King."

Upon this point the undersigned has only to observe that no intimation that Mr. King had received instructions which would have enabled him to resume the negotiation was ever before communicated to the British Government. On the contrary, the only communication at all relating to this matter which has ever reached him in any authentic shape was in a despatch from Mr. Vaughan, dated the 22d of March last, wherein the minister states that "Mr. Clay had informed him that he should not be able to furnish Mr. King with his instructions before the end of the month of May, to enable him to recommence the negotiation."

But, whatever may be the date or tenor of the instructions under which Mr. Gallatin acts, he will have collected from this note that, after all that has passed upon the subject of colonial intercourse, and especially after the advised omission by the Government and Legislature of the United States to meet (as other nations have done) the simple and direct provisions of the act of 1825, the British Government cannot consent to enter into any renewed negotiation upon the intercourse between the United States and the British colonies, so long as the pretension recorded in the act of 1823, and there applied to British colonies alone, remains part of the law of the United States.

But the British Government further owes to the spirit of frankness which it wishes to cultivate in all its relations with the United States to declare that, after having been compelled to apply to any country the interdict prescribed by the act of 1825, the British Government cannot hold itself bound to remove the interdict, as a matter of course, whenever it may happen to suit the convenience of the foreign Government to reconsider the measures by which the application of that interdict was occasioned.

It is not made matter of complaint by the British Government that the United States have declined conditions which other nations have thought worthy of their acceptance.

It is, on the other hand, not the fault of the British Government if the United States have suffered the time to pass by at which it might have been an object of greater importance to this country to induce the United States to come into their proposals.

The United States exercised upon this point a free judgment; and they can, on their part, have no reason to complain that Great Britain, after allowing ample time for maturing that judgment, is contented to abide the result of their decision.

The undersigned requests Mr. Gallatin to accept the assurance of his high consideration.

GEORGE CANNING.

FOREIGN OFFICE, September 11, 1826.

P. S.—The undersigned, on reading over the preceding observations, finds that he has omitted to notice one or two subordinate points touched upon in Mr. Gallatin's note of the 26th of August.

The first relates to the trade between the United States and the British possessions in the East Indies; the second, to the intercourse by inland navigation between the United States and the British possessions in North America.

With regard to the former, it is only necessary to state that the trade with the East Indies remains upon the footing on which it was established by the conventions of 1815 and 1818, with which conventions it is expressly stated in the order in council that the provisions of that order are not intended in any way to interfere.

In respect to the second point, relative to the intercourse by inland navigation between the United States and the British North American provinces, the undersigned begs to inform Mr. Gallatin that that intercourse, so far as relates to the Canadas, is regulated by the act of Parliament of 1825, by which the same duties are expressly imposed on the vessels and boats of the United States importing any goods into either of those provinces as are, or may be for the time being, payable in the United States of America on British vessels or boats entering the harbors of the State from whence such goods shall have been imported.

The discriminating duties, besides, only apply to trade by sea; and if, in any instance, they have been levied upon American goods brought into his Majesty's possessions by inland navigation, or on the boats and vessels employed in that navigation, there will be no difficulty in directing the amount so levied to be repaid, unless it should appear that the like duties had been levied in the American ports upon the inland navigation and trade of the British provinces.

G. C.

Mr. Gallatin to the Secretary of State, dated London, September 22, 1826.

[Despatch No. 13.—Extract.]

"I have the honor to enclose the copy of my answer to Mr. Canning's note of the 11th instant, relating to the order in council of 27th of July last."

Mr. Gallatin to Mr. Canning.

The undersigned, Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States of America, has the honor to acknowledge the receipt of the note of the 11th instant, addressed to him by Mr. Canning, his Majesty's principal Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, in answer to that of the undersigned of the 26th ultimo, on the subject of the order in council of the 27th of July.

The undersigned apprehends that the object of his note of the 26th ultimo may not have been altogether understood. It was not his intention to make on that occasion a full exposition, much less to argue in support of either his own opinions or those of his Government, upon the whole matter to which the order in council relates.

His opinion of the character of the colonial trade did not enter into the view he was taking of the subject. He is not aware to have expressed that of his Government upon any other point than that of the preference it gave to an arrangement by treaty to regulations respectively enacted by each country.

The arguments ascribed to him seem to be rather inferences to which he might not have objected, did he not feel bound to disclaim any intention on his part to have suggested what the British Government ought to have done; an expression applicable only to the case of an alleged violation of a positive or implied obligation.

The object of the note of the undersigned was simply what it purported to be: to express his regret that, under existing circumstances, the order in council should have been issued, and to avow his inability to discover its motive. This has now been frankly and distinctly explained by Mr. Canning. And the principal error which pervades the note of the undersigned is, that he had supposed that the intercourse between the United States and the colonies of Great Britain was still considered as beneficial to her; that he was wholly unaware that the interdict on that intercourse in American vessels was founded in considerations of a general nature, and connected with an intention not to renew, at least for the present, the negotiations on this subject.

It is true that the undersigned had overlooked the fact that, since the 5th of January, 1826, the indirect intercourse was allowed in American and forbidden in British vessels; and, to that extent, his assertion of a perfect equality existing between the vessels of both nations was erroneous, though, in reality, the want of equality in that respect may have been compensated by other restrictions and charges imposed on American vessels.

The undersigned has it not in his power to assign the reasons why the provisions of the act of Congress of 1823, relating to that indirect intercourse, have been continued in force after the corresponding restrictions of Great Britain had been removed, so far as related to foreign countries. It is not improbable that the attention of the Government of the United States having been principally turned to the general question whether it was not most eligible that the trade should be regulated by treaty or by the respective laws of the two countries, the fact that this particular restriction had been thus revoked by the act of Parliament of 1825 may have escaped its notice.

The communication made in the latter part of Mr. Canning's note of the intentions of the British Government would not seem, considered done, to impose any other duty on the undersigned than to transmit it to his own. But it is accompanied by various observations, one of which at least has almost the appearance of a charge against the Government of the United States, and it may not be improper for the undersigned to avail himself of the opportunity thus afforded once more to state the view of the whole subject which is entertained by the United States.

Great Britain asserts as clear and undoubted the right to give to the United States, or to withhold from them, the privilege of trading with her West India colonies, to reserve to herself that trade, and generally to open the ports of those colonies to foreign Powers, or to keep them closed, as may suit her own convenience, wholly or partially, unconditionally or conditionally, and if conditionally, on what conditions she pleases.

As an abstract and general proposition the right is not denied; but considered purely as a matter of right, this, which is an attribute of sovereignty, applies to all other territories as well as to colonies.

Every nation has the abstract right generally, and not in reference to her colonies alone, to close or to open her ports to foreign vessels or merchandise, and to grant the indulgence wholly or partially, conditionally or unconditionally. This right has been, and continues to be, exercised occasionally by every nation in the shape of navigation, prohibitory, and restrictive laws, operating unequally on different nations.

The real distinction between the trade of foreigners with colonies and that with other territories seems to consist not in a greater or less complete right, but in a difference in the usage and practice. It has long since been found that if commerce with foreign nations was advantageous, it was necessary, in order to enjoy it, to suffer them to participate in it.

That an exclusive monopoly of the colonial trade was not the best mode of preserving colonies, or of promoting their prosperity, is a recent discovery. But since the late final separation of the greater part of the continent of America from the mother countries, and now that more enlightened views prevail as respects the remaining colonies, the former peculiar character of the colonial trade is almost lost. The abstract right being the same, and the ancient system of colonial policy having been nearly abandoned, it is difficult to perceive any striking difference between the trade with colonies and that with the mother country.

These are general observations drawn from the undersigned by the repeated references to an abstract right, which is not questioned, and by the effort to consider still the commerce with colonies as essentially differing from every other. But the intercourse between the United States and the British West Indies has, in fact, always been considered by both parties as of a peculiar character, which distinguished it from every other species of colonial trade; and the declarations of the United States to participate in that commerce are of a much earlier date than Mr. Canning seems to have been aware of.

As early as the year 1783 the Government of Great Britain, deviating from that principle of the colonial system, according to which her colonies were prohibited from trading directly with any other country, allowed her West India colonies to trade directly with the United States of America in British vessels. This permission had been continued almost without any interruption till the year 1822, when a more extensive change in the colonial policy superseded that partial measure. And during the European war Great Britain found it convenient [not] occasionally, but repeatedly, to open her West India ports to American vessels, at the same time that she was asserting the principle, uniformly denied by the United States, that a neutral was not authorized by the laws of nations to carry on in time of war a trade with a colony in which he was not permitted to participate in time of peace.

Had Great Britain, adhering to her colonial system, interdicted the intercourse altogether, and always, in war as in peace, in British as well as in American vessels, no claim on that subject would or could have been advanced by the United States. But that trade having been allowed by Great Britain, it may be said from the beginning and at all times, became thereby so far assimilated to that with her European dominions that the United States did think that they had the same claim to a participation in both. The serious difficulties in which they were involved more than once, by the pretensions of Great Britain to adhere to what has been called the rule of the seven years war, rendered it also questionable whether it might not be better policy to reject, in time of war, a trade which was not allowed in time of peace, or to claim in time of peace that which was allowed in time of war.

The United States always did believe that the compensation for what Great Britain considers as a concession, as a boon, was found in the advantages resulting to her from the trade itself. And it must not be forgotten that she, as well as all other nations, participates gratuitously in the trade of countries which, as colonies, were till lately closed to foreigners, which, had they fallen into her hands, would have still been considered as such, and which, by their incorporation with the United States, have been thrown open to the world. Indeed, had Louisiana belonged to any other country, and been its only colony, the admission therein of British vessels and commerce, as contemplated by the act of Parliament of 1825, would alone have been sufficient to extend to such country the privileges offered on certain conditions by that act.

Taking all the facts and circumstances which have been stated into consideration, the United States have been of opinion that they might, without violating the regard due to the usages and opinions of others, claim to treat on that subject as on that of any other commercial intercourse, and on the basis of equal and reciprocal conditions.

The claim has accordingly been brought forward, and considered by both parties as a fit subject for negotiation, from the time when any of a commercial nature first commenced between the two countries.

An article on that subject made part of the treaty of 1794, but was found so inadequate, and was accompanied by such restrictions and conditions, as to induce the United States to reject it at the risk of losing the whole treaty.

The sixth article of the unratified treaty of 1806 stated that "the high contracting parties, not having been able to arrange at present, by treaty, any commercial intercourse between the territories of the United States and his Majesty's islands and ports in the West Indies, agree that, until that subject shall be regulated in a satisfactory manner, each of the parties shall remain in the complete possession of its rights in respect to such an intercourse." A similar reservation of rights made part of the convention of 1815, renewed and prolonged in 1818.

In the negotiation of 1818, and in every subsequent one relating to the colonial intercourse, the determination of the United States to conclude no arrangement unless founded on a fair reciprocity has been distinctly avowed. The undersigned had always understood that, however differing as to the extent of the intercourse and other important points, that basis had not been objected to on the part of Great Britain.

Every article, indeed, proposed then or since by her has the appearance of that character; and the preamble of the counter-projet offered on the 4th of June, 1824, by the British plenipotentiaries states that "his Britannic Majesty and the United States of America, being desirous to regulate, by mutual agreement and on principles of just reciprocity, the trade now open, under their respective laws, between the United States and the British colonies in North America and the West Indies, have," &c.

The third proposed article again declares it to be "the desire and intention of the high contracting parties to place the trade in question on a footing of just reciprocity."

It is believed that the difficulties which have prevented an arrangement satisfactory to both parties have been wholly unconnected with questions of abstract right; that they may, especially at first, have arisen in part from a reluctance on the part of Great Britain to depart too widely from her colonial policy; that, so far from being due to any objection to the principle of reciprocity, they had lately originated principally in a mutual apprehension that the proposals of the other party were a departure from that principle. The failure of an attempt to make an amicable arrangement left each party to pursue its own course; and the natural consequence has been that the measures adopted by either may not have been always satisfactory to the other; that occasionally they may have been carried beyond what the occasion required. A discussion of all that has been done in that respect on both sides would at present be unprofitable. The undersigned will confine his observations to those enactments which appear to have been most obnoxious to Great Britain, and are to be found in the act of Congress of 1823.

The first is the provision of that act whereby discriminating duties on British vessels and merchandise coming from the British colonies were not to cease until it was ascertained that no higher duties were levied in the said colonies on American vessels and merchandise than upon British vessels and like merchandise imported from elsewhere, that is to say, from other British territories, as well as from other countries. That provision might appear unusual and objectionable, but might have been expected.

The principle was implied in the article proposed by the American plenipotentiaries in 1818, at which time the object was explicitly stated and discussed, and it was distinctly expressed in another article proposed by the United States as supplementary to the convention of 1818, and delivered on the 13th June, 1819, to Lord Castlereagh by Mr. Rush.

Prior to the time when protecting duties were laid upon American produce imported into the British West Indies the United States had made proposals intended either to prevent that contingency or to reserve the right of countervailing the protecting by discriminating duties. After the protecting duties had been actually laid by the act of Parliament of 1822, they did, on the same ground, continue those alien duties, which, on account of the other provisions of that act, would otherwise have been revoked.

That claim, on their part, was at all times considered as inadmissible by the British Government. It was always said that every country had a right to protect its own produce: that Great Britain would protect that of her colonies; that the demand of America was no more founded in reason or usage than if the British Government should ask that the sugar of her colonies should be placed by the United States, as respected duties, on the same footing as that of Louisiana.

To this it was answered that the general principle advanced by Great Britain was unquestionable; but that, so long as she regulated the colonial trade on principles different from those which she applied to the commerce with her European territories, so long as she did not treat them as integral parts, but as dependencies of her empire, the United States must necessarily consider them, in a commercial point of view, as distinct countries.

Mr. Canning has deemed it necessary to say that it cannot be supposed that Great Britain had precluded herself from extending to other nations the privilege of trading with the British West Indies, in the first instance granted in effect exclusively to the United States; a supposition which certainly never was made. And he has added that the question was now no longer, as in 1820 or 1822, between the United States and Great Britain, but between her and all the nations of the Old and New World, to all of whom she had tendered access to her colonies. Whether this last measure should produce any change in the policy of Great Britain towards the United States is, of course, a question for her to decide. As respects them, so far from thinking themselves affected by the opening of the British colonies to other foreign nations—so far from considering this as interfering with their commerce, or, in any way, as a subject of apprehension, they have hailed that measure as an important step towards that entire freedom of trade which it is their interest and their avowed wish should become universal. And considering that the British colonies had been thus, in a commercial point of view, nearly assimilated to the mother country, and might no longer be viewed as distinct countries, it became one of the principal motives for authorizing the undersigned to desist from the ground heretofore assumed, on the subject of the protecting duties laid by Great Britain on the produce of the United States imported into her colonies, and thereby to remove the principal obstacle which had till then prevented an amicable arrangement on the subject of the colonial trade. It is hardly necessary to add that the instructions which gave that authority were drawn at a time when there was not the least expectation on the part of the Government of the United States that it was intended by that of his Majesty's to interdict the intercourse, and to decline the renewal of negotiations on that point.

The other enactment of the act of Congress of 1823, on which Mr. Canning has especially animadverted, is that which forbids any British vessel, unless having come directly from the British West India colonies, to clear from a port of the United States to any of those colonies. It is said that this right has been denied to Great Britain by the United States, not perhaps in contradiction to the letter, but undoubtedly in deviation from the spirit of the treaty of 1815. Such serious charge the undersigned is bound to repel.

The argument adduced in support of that assertion rests on the gratuitous supposition that the privilege which, before the convention of 1815, British vessels coming from other ports than the British West India colonies enjoyed, to clear from a port of the United States to those colonies, was a right instead of a permission, which indeed was not granted to them especially, but which they had in common with all other vessels, from whatever port they might have come. The United States had the undoubted right to grant or to withhold that permission, and in that, as in every other case where the right was not restricted by treaty, to regulate the intercourse in foreign vessels between their own and foreign territories, of every description, as suited their convenience. And this general right, which existed before the convention of 1815, was by that compact preserved expressly and without exception as respected the intercourse between the United States and the British West Indies.

The indirect intercourse alluded to is so intimately connected with the trade in general, that a reservation, whereby the United States, whilst allowed to forbid the direct intercourse, would have been bound to permit it to be carried on indirectly in British vessels, would have been useless and nugatory. Since British, having in this respect a decided advantage over American vessels, on account of the circuitous voyages which they may make from England to the United States, and thence to the West India colonies, it was precisely the branch of the trade against which it was most important for the United States to preserve the right.

That right was actually enforced under the American navigation act of 1818, without being objected to, or being made a bar to negotiations. When the general restrictions of this act were repealed by the act of 1823, this particular provision was in substance retained; and the undersigned understands that his Majesty's minister at Washington objected to it, not as being a deviation from the convention, but because he erroneously believed that it had not its counterpart in the acts of Parliament then in force. In 1824 that provision appears to have been adverted to by the British plenipotentiaries only for the purpose of remarking that it confined British vessels to a direct trade in the same manner as American vessels were restricted by the act of Parliament, and even to a greater degree.

It may be here observed that neither this nor any other provision of the act of Congress of 1823 would at this time have interposed any obstacle to the favorable issue of a negotiation upon the intercourse between the United States and the British colonies. But as respects the preliminary condition, without which the British Government cannot consent to enter into any renewed negotiation on that subject, the undersigned is at a loss how to construe it. It cannot seriously be expected by his Majesty's Government that the United States, even if it had not been mentioned as a preliminary condition, should repeal their restrictions on British vessels, when not only the intercourse is altogether prohibited in American shipping, but when they are with frankness informed that a removal of that interdict will not, as a matter of course, follow such repeal on their part. What renders that allusion to a repeal of the enactments of the act of 1823 still less intelligible, it perhaps only affords an additional proof that both Governments may occasionally overlook some of the provisions contained in the laws of the other, is, that it is provided by the sixth section of that act that it shall cease to operate if at any time the intercourse in American vessels should be prohibited by a British order in council or act of Parliament, and that in such case the acts of Congress of 1818 and 1820 shall revive and be in full force. That contingency has actually taken place. As a natural consequence of the order in council, the act of 1823 ceases to be the law of the United States after the 1st of December next. And the act which Mr. Canning allows to have been justified will again revive.

The intercourse, direct and indirect, will then be prohibited by the laws of both countries. Where there is no commerce there can be no discriminating or other duties. The two countries will again be placed, as respects that intercourse, in the same situation in which they were before the act of Parliament of 1822 and that of Congress of 1823.

If there is any difference, it will consist in this: the right of Great Britain both to decline to negotiate and to continue her interdict of the intercourse, even if the United States should accede to the conditions of the act of Parliament of 1825, is incontestable. The undersigned begs leave, however, to suggest that an act excluding the United States from a trade open to the rest of the world is, as a permanent measure, of a different character from a general exclusion of all foreign nations.

The undersigned requests Mr. Canning to accept the assurance of his high consideration.

ALBERT GALLATIN.

UPPER SEYMOUR STREET, September 22, 1826.

Mr. Vaughan to Mr. Clay.

WASHINGTON, September 28, 1826.

SIR: I have the honor to communicate to you the substance of a despatch which I have this day received from his Majesty's Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, in which I am directed to announce to you the determination of his Majesty's Government to allow the provisions of the act of 1825, which regulates the commerce with British colonies, to have their course.

In resorting to this determination, the conduct of his Majesty's Government is open to the imputation of tardiness, rather than to that of precipitation.

A hope had been entertained that the late session of Congress would not have been suffered to pass by without the adoption of some measure, on the recommendation of the President, for the abolition of the discriminating duties which, for three years past, have been levied in the ports of the United States on British vessels trading between the United States and the British colonies in North America and the West Indies.

A proposition made by his Majesty's Government to the United States, through the British plenipotentiaries, in the late negotiations carried on in London—a proposition, having for its object the reciprocal abolition of all discriminating duties levied on colonial intercourse, has been, since the summer of 1824, under the consideration of the American Government.

An act of Parliament passed in July, 1825, which, while it offered the liberty of trading with the British colonies to all nations, limited that liberty "to the ships of those countries which, having colonial possessions, should grant the like privileges of trading with those possessions to British ships, or which, not having colonial possessions, should place the commerce and navigation of this country and of its possessions abroad upon the footing of the most favored nation."

The United States have no colonial possessions, but they might have placed the trade of his Majesty's colonies in America in British vessels upon the footing of the most favored nation in the ports of the United States, and they have not done so.

It would have been infinitely more agreeable to his Majesty's Government that the liberal disposition manifested by England towards the United States should have produced a corresponding disposition on the part of the American Government.

But, finding themselves disappointed in their long-cherished hope that such would be the course of the Government of the United States, it remains for them only to let the provisions of the act of 1825 take their course.

I seize this opportunity to renew to you the assurances of my high consideration.

CHARLES R. VAUGHAN.

Mr. Clay to Mr. Vaughan.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, October 11, 1826.

SIR: I have received and submitted to the President of the United States the note which you did me the honor, on the 28th ultimo, to address to me, communicating the substance of a despatch which you had received from the British Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, in which you were directed to announce the determination of his Britannic Majesty's Government to allow the provisions of the act of Parliament of 1825 regulating the commerce with British colonies to have their course.

The Government of the United States have ever been anxious that the trade between them and the British colonies should be placed upon a liberal and equitable basis. There has not been a moment since the adoption of the present Constitution when they were not willing to apply to it the principle of fair reciprocity and equal competition. There has not been a time during the same period when they have understood the British Government to be prepared to adopt that principle. When the convention in 1815 was concluded, the American Government was desirous of extending its principles to the British possessions in the West Indies and on the continent of North America; but, at the instance of the British Government, those possessions were expressly excepted from the operation of the convention. Upon the agreement in 1818 between the two Powers to prolong the operation of that convention, the British Government had not made up their mind to extend its principles to those possessions. It would be as painful as unnecessary to enter into a detail of all the countervailing acts of legislation which, subsequent to that period, were resorted to by the parties in which the struggle on the side of Great Britain was to maintain her monopoly, and on that of the United States to secure an equal participation in the trade and intercourse between them and the British colonies. In 1824 a negotiation was again opened between them on this and other subjects, through Mr. Rush and Messrs. Huskisson and Canning, at London, and a gleam of hope broke out of the reconciliation of the two parties on that long-contested matter; but, as there were one or two points in relation to it on which they could not agree, the negotiation was suspended, with an understanding that it should be again renewed at some early day after the two Governments had fully deliberated on the questions which prevented an agreement. Mr. King was sent to Great Britain by the United States, as their plenipotentiary, in the spring of 1825, and, but for the state of his health, which compelled his return and rendered necessary the appointment of a successor, would have entered upon the negotiation. In the meantime, in July, 1825, the British Parliament passed the act referred to in your note; but no copy of that act has ever, at London or at Washington, been officially communicated to the Government of the United States by the British Government; nor has there been communicated to this Government any expectation of his Britannic Majesty's Government that the regulation of the intercourse with the British colonies should be effected by mutual acts of legislation. The Government of the United States, on the contrary, has reposed in full confidence that it was the view and wish of both parties that, on the resumption of the suspended negotiation, that subject should be again taken up and provided for; and, accordingly, Mr. Gallatin has carried with him instructions which we had every reason to hope and believe would enable him to concur with the British Government in an adjustment of it on terms which would be entirely satisfactory to both parties.

Judge, then, sir, of the surprise and regret which the President must have felt on receiving the information conveyed in your note. If the British act of Parliament were intended in the nature of a proposition to the Congress of the United States, it should have been officially communicated for their consideration, accompanied by those explanations which the complexity of the British system and the terms of the act rendered necessary—explanations the more necessary to a foreign Government since the act has been differently interpreted by British authorities at different places, and, it is believed, at the same place at different times. If the British Government had recollected that the subject of this intercourse was comprehended in the negotiation which both parties expected shortly to resume, it is difficult to understand on what foundation it should have placed the hope that Congress, on the recommendation of the President, would have abolished the discriminating duties. Supposing the American Government prepared to consent to their abolition, two modes of accomplishing the object presented themselves—one by treaty, and the other by acts of separate legislation. The two Governments had selected the former as the more eligible, by opening a negotiation of which there was only a temporary suspension. The terms of the British act of Parliament are general, applying to all foreign nations, and doubts, at one time, were entertained here whether it was intended to apply at all to the United States or not. If, during the three past years, the alien duties have been levied on British vessels entering the ports of the United States, during the greater part of the same period duties professed to be equal and countervailing, but really exceeding them, have been levied on vessels of the United States in the British colonial ports. If they have been discontinued, it has been done voluntarily by the British Government. The Government of the United States has not and would not have complained, during the continuance of their alien duties, of the imposition of equal duties in the British ports.

It is true that the proposal by the British plenipotentiaries to Mr. Rush was made about two years ago, and that it has been under consideration of this Government since it was received. Mr. Gallatin is now in full possession of the decision of the President, and the causes which have prevented an earlier communication of it are well known to the British Government. But if these causes had not existed, the lapse of time would not be extraordinary, especially when compared with that which had passed between the proposal of the American Government in 1815 and 1824. The act of Parliament was only passed in July of the last year. The operation commenced in January. It made a very great alteration in the British colonial system. Its provisions were numerous and complicated, and it referred to other acts also containing numerous provisions, all of which it was necessary to understand. Under these circumstances, it could not be deemed unreasonable if the American Government had required some time to ascertain the nature and effect of these changes.

If the President finds in the measure itself which you have announced just occasion for surprise, the moment which was selected for its promulgation in England is calculated to augment it. The moment was that of Mr. Gallatin's arrival in England, charged with full powers and instructions to arrange this affair upon the most liberal terms, and such as was confidently believed would be satisfactory to Great Britain. And you have, doubtless, long since communicated to the British Government the substance of conversations with me, in which you were informed that he would take with him instructions, framed in a conciliatory spirit, on all the points embraced in the negotiation which was commenced in 1824.

If the President does not require a revocation of that part of the order in council which prohibits the admission of vessels of the United States, after certain specified days, into certain British colonial ports, as a preliminary to all negotiation on the subject, it is because, faithful to the desire which he anxiously entertains of preserving the harmony and amity between the two countries, he will not follow the unfriendly example which has been exhibited by the British Government. He still cherishes the hope that the discussions between Mr. Gallatin and the British Government will terminate in an adjustment of the colonial intercourse which may advance the interests of both countries.

I request that you will accept assurances of my distinguished consideration.

HENRY CLAY.

Rt. Hon. C. R. VAUGHAN, Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary from Great Britain.

Mr. Clay to Mr. Vaughan.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, October 19, 1826.

SIR: In a conversation which I had the honor of holding with you at the Department of State a few days ago I inquired of you whether, under the act of Parliament of July, 1825, American vessels were allowed to export to foreign countries other than the dominions of Great Britain the produce of the British West India islands in like manner with British vessels, and at that time you could not inform me. Perhaps the late arrivals may enable you to supply the information. I have, under that hope, to request that you will inform me whether, according to the British interpretation of that act of Parliament, American vessels may export to and import from foreign countries other than the dominions aforesaid the produce and manufactures of those countries and colonies, respectively, in like manner with British vessels, and also whether all discriminating duties and charges, imposed either by the local authorities of the British colonies, or by the British Parliament, between vessels of the United States and British vessels have been abolished. The importance of a solution of these inquiries will readily present itself to you.

I avail myself of this occasion to renew to you a tender of my high consideration.

H. CLAY.

Rt. Hon. C. R. VAUGHAN, Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary from Great Britain.

Mr. Vaughan to Mr. Clay.

WASHINGTON, October 20, 1826.

SIR: I am sorry that it is not in my power to answer satisfactorily the inquiry which you make in your note of yesterday, whether, under the act of Parliament of July, 1825, American vessels were allowed to export to foreign countries other than the dominions of Great Britain the produce of the British West Indian islands in like manner with British vessels.

I am not in possession of any documents which can lead me to put a construction upon the meaning of that act beyond the import of the words in which its provisions are conveyed.

I can only refer you, therefore, to that act, from whence you will be able to draw a just conclusion of the rule which it is intended should govern the commercial intercourse with British colonies.

I request that you will accept the renewed assurances of my distinguished consideration.

CHARLES R. VAUGHAN.

Hon. H. CLAY, Secretary of State.

No. 14.*

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, November 11, 1826.

SIR: Agreeably to the intimation given in my letter, under date the 31st ultimo, I proceed to communicate to you the view which has been taken here of the official note of his Britannic Majesty's principal Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, addressed to you on the 11th September last.

If the British Government had contented itself with simply announcing in that note its determination no longer to treat with that of the United States on the intercourse with the British colonies, however unexpected by us such a determination would have been, we might have felt ourselves bound silently to acquiesce in the declared pleasure of his Britannic Majesty's Government. Two parties, at least, are necessary to the conduct of any negotiation, and if one absolutely declines treating, the other, of necessity, must abide by his decision. But the British Government, not satisfied with merely communicating the fact of its resolution no longer to negotiate with the United States for an arrangement of the colonial trade which might reconcile the interest and wishes of both parties, brings forward new principles, to some of which we cannot subscribe, and seeks to cast upon us the blame of the want of success which has attended past endeavors to effect that object, which we cannot admit. The frankness which has ever characterized all our correspondence with the British Government requires that our objections to those principles and our dissent from such an imputation should be respectfully stated. In doing this, I will begin with a brief statement of certain general propositions which are supposed to be incontestible.

It is the undoubted right of every nation to prohibit or allow foreign commerce with all or any part of its dominions, wherever situated and whatever may be their denominations, parental or colonial, or the modes of Government in the respective parts. It may prescribe for itself the conditions on which the foreign trade is tolerated; but these conditions are not obligatory upon other nations unless they in some form assent to them. All such conditions, in respect to foreign Powers, are in the nature of proposals, which they are as free to accept or decline as the other party was to tender them. If a nation has colonies it may unquestionably reserve to itself exclusively the right of trading with them.

But it cannot be admitted that in regard to foreign Powers there is anything in the nature and condition of colonies, or in the relation which subsists between them and the country to which they belong, which distinguishes the power of regulating their commerce from that which is exercised over the parent country. That parent country may have its motives of jealousy or policy for a rigorous exclusion of all intercourse between its colonies and foreigners. But the moment it chooses to relax and open its colonial ports to a foreign trade, whether the relaxation is moved by a temporary or permanent interest or necessity, the right is acquired by foreign States to examine and judge for themselves the conditions on which they are proposed to be admitted, and to reject or accept them accordingly. This right of foreign nations is conceded, in the official note which I am considering, when the colonial Power is urged by the pressure of immediate wants to throw open for a time its colonial ports, but is denied when it chooses to open them permanently. The right, in both instances, rests upon the same ground, and that is, that in all commercial exchanges, national or individual, the parties to them are equal, and have the same independent power of judging each for himself; and there is much more reason, on account of the greater duration of the interest, that the right in question should be exercised in a permanent than a temporary trade.

All commerce is founded upon mutual convenience and advantage. And this principle is equally applicable to a commerce with colonial possessions, and with the country to which they belong, or to any other country. In trading with any colonies we have no more imagined that a privilege had been gratuitously conceded to us than that we had made such a concession to the colonial Power in allowing its colonies to trade with the United States. It cannot, therefore, be admitted that any other compensation is due from the United States to Great Britain for the permission to trade with her colonies than that which springs from the mutual exchanges, which are the object of that and of all commerce. If the prosecution of any given trade be found upon experiment unprofitable to either party, that party will no longer pursue it; and we may safely confide in the discernment of individuals to repress or stimulate adventure, according to the loss or gain which may be incident to it. The British Government, fully sensible of this salutary law, was supposed, in the recent liberal commercial policy which it professed to have intended by the example of her homage, to have inculcated its observance upon all nations.

The idea that the admission into colonial ports of foreign vessels is a boon granted by the parent country, that is, a benefaction without equivalent, is as new as it is extraordinary. In that intercourse which has been allowed by the British Government between its colonies and the United States, never fully opened, sometimes entirely closed, and, when reluctantly admitted, fettered by numerous restrictions, we recognize anything but a boon. The leading motive which appears to have actuated the British Government in respect to the exchange of American and colonial produce has been to sell here what could be sold, if sold at all, nowhere else so profitably, and to buy of us exactly so much as she could obtain nowhere else, at least so profitably.

*This despatch was transmitted to Mr. Gallatin prior to the receipt of his answer of the 22d September to Mr. Canning's note of the 11th of the same month.

On our side, whenever the trade has been open, there have been no restrictions as to the objects of exportation from the United States to the British colonies. An enumeration here of the numerous prohibitions and restrictions on the British side, upon articles both of colonial and American produce, would extend this paper to a most unreasonable length. And with respect to the transportation of the subjects of this limited trade, the aim of the British Government has been, by all its regulations, to engross a disproportionate share.

This intention was clearly developed in the treaty of 1794, and has been adhered to with steady perseverance during the thirty-two intervening years. Such an intercourse deserves to be characterized in any other way than that of a British boon to the United States.

It cannot be admitted that the fact that the United States have no colonies varies the principles applicable to an intercourse with the British colonies. In the consideration of the conditions on which a foreign trade shall be tolerated, it is of no consequence what name or what Government a State may choose to bestow on the several parts of its dominions. Some of the Territories of the United States are governed by peculiar local forms, altogether different from those of the States of the Confederacy; but we have never contended that this anomaly ought to affect the regulation of our commercial intercourse with foreign Powers. A country having no colonies may be so situated as to afford the same kind of productions as both another country and its colonies. And there may be a greater difference in the nature and value of the productions of two different countries, neither of which have colonies, than exists between those of a country and its colonies and another which has no colonies. It might as well be argued that the fact of twenty-four States composing this Union entitles it to demand concessions from all other Powers whose territory is not divided into an equal number of similar parts, or that the United Kingdom, being constituted by the union of three Kingdoms, would be justified in demanding upon that ground, from any Power composed only of a single Kingdom, more than it granted. In all commercial intercourse between different Powers the question resolves itself into one of profit and loss. If it be the interest of the parties that the trade should be allowed, it is altogether immaterial how those territories are governed or divided—both have an equal right to judge of the conditions of the intercourse. It would be most strange if the fact of a foreign State (Sweden for example) possessing a colony, no matter how unimportant, entitled such State to treat on different principles with Great Britain, in respect to an intercourse with her colonies, from the United States.

Neither can it be admitted that the possession of colonies entitles the nation holding them to the exclusive enjoyment of the circuitous navigation between the parent country and a foreign country through any or all of those colonies, upon the ground of its being the prosecution of a coasting trade, which is understood to have been taken by Great Britain. If the connexion between the United Kingdom and its numerous colonies is to be regarded in the light of that of a continuous coast, it must be allowed that this coast has very great extent. It passes around Cape Horn, doubles the Cape of Good Hope, crosses the Atlantic Ocean, penetrates almost every sea, touches every continent, and encircles the globe. A colonial coasting trade of this universal reach presents none of the properties of an ordinary coasting trade, except that of the identity of sovereign power. The foundation on which nations are supposed to reserve to themselves, exclusively, their own coasting trade is not merely that of monopoly, but principally because they are thereby better enabled to check all invasions of their own laws—a reason which is inapplicable to the widely dispersed condition of the British colonial possessions.

Entertaining such opinions as have been herein stated, in regard to the power of commercial regulation, the Government of the United States has always conceived that the trade between them and the British colonies was open to all considerations which are applicable to any other trade, and that it was consequently a fit subject of arrangement by treaty, or in any manner by which any other trade might be regulated. Great Britain may, undoubtedly, if she pleases, deny to herself the advantage of consulting with foreign Powers, through the accustomed organs of intercourse, as to the conditions on which, with mutual benefit, the trade may be carried on; but if she chooses to restrict herself to the single mode of regulating it by act of Parliament, it cannot be admitted either that such restriction is a necessary consequence from the nature of colonies, or, as will be hereafter shown, that it is in accordance with the practice of the British Government itself.

The British Secretary of State alleges that in 1822 the British Government opened the colonial intercourse to us, and withheld it from all other Powers; that, in effect, we thereby acquired a monopoly in the supply of the consumption of the British West Indies; but that Great Britain did not preclude herself from the right to open her colonial ports to other nations whenever it might suit her purposes. We did not ask that Great Britain should shut her colonial ports to other Powers. The occlusion was, no doubt, in consequence of the estimate which she made of her own interests, without any intention to confer an exclusive benefit upon us, as the opening of them by the act of 1825 is according to a similar estimate. We have no right to complain, and never have complained, that Great Britain seeks for the United Kingdom and for its colonies the best markets for sale and purchase, any more than we anticipate any complaint from her, if, when we are driven from her colonial ports, we should exercise the like liberty. If she has reason to felicitate herself that, by the course of events, she is enabled to draw from other sources those supplies which her colonies had been in the habit of obtaining from the United States, we have, perhaps, occasion for equal congratulation that, by the same or other events, markets have been opened to us, which may be found ample substitutes to those which it is her pleasure to close against us.

As to the monopoly which it is alleged we have enjoyed, it should be observed that the relative position of the British West India colonies to the United States, and the nature of their respective climates and productions, are eminently favorable to a mutually beneficial commerce between them. From their proximity to the United States they find their convenience in drawing from us those perishable and bulky articles which they want, rather than from more distant countries. If the West India islands were situated on the European instead of the American side of the Atlantic Ocean, and Europe could supply as cheaply and abundantly the same description of articles as the United States, the British West India colonies would prefer obtaining their necessary supplies from Europe. The United States contribute to other West India colonies in as great an extent, and share in the navigation between them as largely as they do in their intercourse with those of Great Britain. This is the effect of the law of proximity. If it be a monopoly, it has emanated from no human power, but from a much higher source. Far from repining at the dispensations of Providence, nations, contented with the portion of his bounty which has been allotted to each, would do well to acquiesce, with cheerful submission, in the arrangements of the universe, which, in his wisdom, he has thought proper to order.

The United States have never made it a subject of serious complaint that for the indulgence which their laws have granted of unrestricted liberty of importation or exportation of whatever is produced or manufactured in the United States, or in the British colonies respectively, they have been met, in return, with a long catalogue of prohibitions and restrictions, including some of the staple commodities on both sides. Although they have desired the abolition of those restrictions, they have left it to the sole and undisturbed consideration of the British Government whether the prosperity of their colonies themselves would not be best promoted by the application to the intercourse of those liberal principles which have obtained the sanction of the present enlightened age. The Government of the United States has contented itself with insisting that, circumscribed as the trade has been, according to the pleasure of the British Government, the regulation of the navigation employed in it should be founded on principles of reciprocity, so as to allow fair competition between the vessels of the two countries.

The position now assumed, that colonial trade with foreign States is not a fit subject for negotiation with those States, but belongs exclusively to the regulation of the parent country, is entirely new. It is not sustained by the practice of other Powers having colonies. It is not sustained by the practice of Great Britain herself; and this brings me to the consideration of what has passed between the two Governments in relation to this trade.

They negotiated on that subject, to go no further back, in the year 1794. Their negotiations resulted in the 12th article of the treaty of amity, commerce, and navigation, which was then concluded. The very fact of treating between two independent States implies the right in each of considering and determining the mutual propositions which may be offered. The two Powers again negotiated on the same subject in 1796, and because the Government of the United States did not conceive that the concessions of Great Britain, contained in the 12th article of the treaty of 1794, were equivalent to the concessions on their side, it was annulled. They again negotiated in 1815, and actually entered into stipulations which, as you well know, form a part of the convention of the 3d of July of that year, for the regulation of the British East India trade; but not being able to come to any agreement in regard to the British West India trade, it was left to the two countries to regulate this subject by their respective laws. On that occasion it was stated by Lord Castlereagh that the British Government would not regard as unfriendly any measure which the United States might think it expedient to put into operation for the regulation of that trade. And to guard against all misconception, it is moreover expressly provided in the treaty itself that "the intercourse between the United States and his Britannic Majesty's possessions in the West Indies and on the continent of North America shall not be affected by any of the provisions of this article, but each party shall remain in the complete possession of its rights with respect to such an intercourse." With what propriety, then, can it be affirmed that "to withhold from the ship of a country having colonies, trading from the mother country to a foreign State, under a regular treaty between the two countries, the right of clearing for another port belonging to that mother country in another part of the world, is an injury"—an injury, "undoubtedly in deviation from the spirit of the treaty." The regular treaty referred to excludes, by its positive terms, all regulation of the intercourse between the United States and the British colonies in the West Indies. And yet it is contended that Great Britain has the right, according to the spirit of the treaty, not only to the benefit of the application of its provisions to a subject which it alone professes to regulate, but to have them applied also to another subject which is expressly declared not to be regulated, and as to which both parties are left in the "complete possession" of all their rights. And this is insisted upon, in behalf of Great Britain, without any corresponding privilege on the part of the United States. If the treaty be competent to carry a British vessel through the British West India ports to the United States, and visa versa, whilst, under similar circumstances, those ports are to remain shut, by British authority, against a vessel of the United States, it would equally entitle such British vessel to pass through the ports of any and every country upon the globe to and from the United States. The United States might, without any violation of the convention of 1815, interdict all intercourse with the British West Indies direct or circuitious. And surely the right to adopt the stronger and more comprehensive, includes the choice of the weaker measure—that of prohibiting to be done by British vessels what Great Britain prohibits, under analogous circumstances, American vessels from doing. It is alleged that that right, from the enjoyment of which we are interdicted by British regulation, nevertheless existed in Great Britain antecedently to any treaty, and at a period when no claim to any trade with British colonies had even been whispered by the United States. As a right it never existed one moment since the independence of the United States. If the privilege were exercised, it was from their moderation and by their sufferance. Since that epoch we are unaware of any period of time when the United States did not claim a reciprocal intercourse with the British colonies. The two countries again unsuccessfully negotiated in relation to the colonial trade in 1817, when Lord Castlereagh submitted a draught of four articles, which did not prove acceptable, and in 1818, and 1819, and finally in 1824. What was the footing on which the intercourse had been placed by the laws of the two countries at the period of opening that last negotiation, you will see by adverting to the instructions of my predecessor under date June 23, 1823, with a copy of which you have been furnished. The long and arduous discussions which took place between Mr. Rush and Messrs. Huskisson and S. Canning in 1824 brought the parties very near together. Each exchanged with the other the proposal with which he would be satisfied, but, as they could not then agree upon either, it was concluded to suspend the negotiation, with a distinct understanding, on both sides, that it should be again resumed at some convenient day. (See protocol of the 25th conference, page 131 of the printed pamphlet.) From a comparison of the American and British proposals (see the former, annexed to the protocol of the third conference, marked A, page 133 of the same pamphlet, and the British counter-projet, marked L, page 142—see also the British paper, marked W, page 135,) it will be seen—

1. That both parties were willing to abolish all discriminating duties on either side.

2. That the British Government was satisfied, and actually offered, that the intercourse should continue restricted to the direct voyage, as it then was by the respective laws of the parties; that is to say, that an American vessel clearing from the British West Indies, with their produce, for an American port, should be required to land her cargo in such port; and, on the other hand, a British vessel clearing from the United States, with their produce, for a colonial port, should be required to land her cargo in such port.

But thirdly, the point on which the parties could not then agree was, that the United States insisted that American produce should be admitted into the British colonial ports upon the same terms as similar produce received from anywhere else; that is, either from a British possession or any foreign country.

Such an equal admission of our produce was contended for, in pursuance of the enactments of the Congress of the United States in the act of March, 1823.

Thus the two parties amicably separated, I repeat, with the perfect understanding of each, that the negotiation, in which such encouraging progress had been made, should be resumed and brought to a final conclusion at some future day. To that renewed negotiation the United States have invariably looked with the confident hope that, when the parties again met, they would be able to reconcile the only difference which obstructed an adjustment. They never could have dreamt that, without the smallest previous notice, and at the very moment of the arrival in England of a new American minister, fully prepared to resume the negotiation, it was to be suddenly arrested, and the new ground for the first time taken, that the subject itself was of a nature to admit of no negotiation. Entire confidence being reposed on the resumption of the negotiation, as the means on which both parties relied, upon the recall of Mr. Rush, in the spring of 1825, Mr. King was sent to replace him, fully empowered to treat on all the subjects (including the colonial trade) of the previous negotiation. He was instructed, in the first instance, as being a subject of more pressing urgency, to invoke the interposition of the British Government to remove the impediments to the execution of the St. Petersburg convention, which had been created by the British commissioner at Washington. And he was informed that his instructions on the objects of the suspended negotiation should be transmitted to him in time again to open it. They would have been so transmitted but that, upon his arrival in England, in the month of June, 1825, he was indisposed, that he learnt that his Britannic Majesty was ill, and that Mr. Canning was also unwell, and, moreover, that the British Cabinet was dispersed over the island, or upon the continent, in the pursuit of health and recreation. Happily his Britannic Majesty and his principal Secretary of Foreign Affairs were restored to health. The British Cabinet did not reassemble until the autumn of 1825, and Mr. King unfortunately remained feeble and unwell up to the period of his return to the United States in consequence of his indisposition. If his instructions were not forwarded to him, it was because it was known that he was engaged in discussions respecting the St. Petersburg convention, and it was believed that his languid condition did not admit of his entering upon the discharge of the more arduous duty of resuming the suspended negotiation. It would now seem to have been altogether useless to have transmitted them, the British Government having made up their mind, from the passage of the act of Parliament of July, 1825, to close the door of negotiation. Such a purpose was never hinted to the Government of the United States. On the contrary, as late as March 22, 1826, Mr. Vaughan addressed an official note to this Department, in which he stated, "I have received instructions from his Majesty's Government to acquaint you that it is preparing to proceed in the important negotiations between that country and the United States, now placed in the hands of the American minister in London; Mr. Huskisson has been already introduced to Mr. R. King, as his Majesty's plenipotentiary, and the Minister of State, having the Department of Foreign Affairs, has received his Majesty's commands to associate Mr. Addington, late his Majesty's Chargé d'Affaires in America, with Mr. Huskisson, as joint plenipotentiary on the part of Great Britain.

"The negotiations will therefore be forthwith resumed, and it will be for the Government of the United States to judge whether, considering the state of the health of Mr. Rufus King, which Mr. Canning laments to say has been, since his arrival in England, far from satisfactory, will join any other negotiator in the commission with him." If the British Government had then intended to bar all negotiation in respect to the colonial trade, no occasion could have been more fit than the transmission of that note to communicate such intention. So far from any such purpose being declared, it is formally notified to the American Government that the British Government is preparing to proceed in the important negotiations, &c., and that the negotiations will be forthwith resumed, [of course including the colonial trade.] It appears from the same note, that the British Government was perfectly acquainted with the feeble condition of Mr. King, and therefore made the friendly suggestion of associating some other persons with him to conduct the negotiation. Mr. Vaughan was verbally informed that we should prepare, as soon as practicable, to renew the negotiation, and that the state of Mr. King's health would be taken into consideration. The President did deliberate on it, and your willingness to be associated with Mr. King in that public service was ascertained.

In the meantime, and before the necessary arrangements could be made for your departure, a letter from Mr. King, under date the 21st day of March, 1826, was received, desiring permission to return, which was promptly granted, and you were immediately appointed, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to succeed him. Without any unnecessary delay you proceeded on your mission, charged with instructions, framed in the most amicable spirit, to renew the suspended negotiation on all points.

It is now necessary to turn back to the British act of Parliament of July, 1825. That act has never to this moment been officially communicated to the American Government by that of Great Britain, and it reached us only through other channels.

We did not suppose, whatever may be the general terms of its enactments, that it was intended to be applied to the United States until, at least, the experiment of the renewed negotiation should have been tried and should have failed. We entertained that supposition because both parties, by all their correspondence and public acts, appeared to regard the renewed negotiation as the means of settling the existing difference. We had other cogent reasons for that supposition. If the British Government intended irrevocably to abide by the conditions which the act of Parliament prescribed, we believed, not only that it would have been officially communicated with a notification to that effect, but that the British minister would have been instructed to give such information as might be necessary to enable us clearly to comprehend its provisions.

This information to a foreign Government could not be deemed altogether unreasonable in respect to an act of Parliament, extremely complicated, spread out into eighty-six sections, besides various tables, and which was accompanied by a contemporaneous act relating to the same subject; also containing numerous provisions, and both referring to other acts of Parliament, the titles of some of which are not even recited. Not only was no such information ever communicated, but you will perceive, from the accompanying correspondence with Mr. Vaughan in the last month, that up to that time he was not provided with instructions to afford a satisfactory answer to the inquiry, whether, according to the British interpretation of the act of Parliament, American vessels may trade between the British colonies and foreign countries other than the United Kingdom in like manner with British vessels, and whether all discriminating duties and charges imposed, either by the local authorities or by the British Parliament, between vessels of the United States and British vessels have been abolished.

The importance of the latter inquiry was increased by information which had reached us that lately, during the present year, the Government of Nova Scotia had passed an act by which American vessels were subjected to higher duties or charges than British. That we sincerely believed that negotiation, and not legislation, was the means by which it was expected an arrangement was to be effected by the parties, will further appear from a letter addressed by me, on the 25th day of December, 1825, to a member of Congress, a copy of which is herewith transmitted. In that letter the opinion is expressed that the British Government could not have intended to apply the act of Parliament of July 5, 1825, to the intercourse between the United States and the British colonies, because, "first, it would be inconsistent with professions made by that Government to this, and with negotiations between the two Governments contemplated, if not yet resumed; secondly, no notice has been given at Washington or at London of such a purpose as that which, for the first time, is indicated at Halifax; thirdly, the British minister here is unadvised by his Government of any intention to close the colonial ports against our vessels; and, fourthly, no information has been received here from any British colonial port, except Halifax, of such intention."

This letter was published in the American gazettes. A copy of it was furnished to Mr. Vaughan, which he is understood to have transmitted to his Government; and it is believed to have had some effect in producing the revocation of an order of the local Government by which the port of Halifax was to have been closed against vessels of the United States from the 5th of January last. The order was, in fact, from whatever cause, revoked; and as that port, and all other British colonial ports remained, after that day, open to our vessels, we were confirmed in the belief that the act, in the present state of the relations of the two countries, was not intended to be enforced on the commerce of the United States. This belief was further strengthened by the terms of the fourth section of the act, which are: "And whereas, by the law of navigation, foreign ships are permitted to import into any of the British possessions abroad, from the countries to which they belong, goods the produce of those countries, and to export goods from such possessions to be carried to any foreign country whatever; and whereas it is expedient that such permission should be subject to certain conditions: Be it therefore enacted, that the privileges thereby granted to foreign ships shall be limited to the ships of those countries which, having colonial possessions, shall grant the like privileges of trading with those possessions to British ships, or which, not having colonial possessions, shall place the commerce and navigation of this country, and of its possessions abroad, upon the footing of the most favored nation, unless his Majesty, by his order in council shall in any case deem it expedient to grant the whole or any of such privileges to the ships of any foreign country, although the conditions aforesaid shall not, in all respects, be fulfilled by such foreign country."

Now, his Britannic Majesty was thereby authorized, by his order in council, if he should, in any case, deem it expedient to grant the whole or any of the privileges mentioned in the section to the ships of any foreign country, "although the conditions aforesaid shall not, in all respects, be fulfilled by such foreign country." This investment of power in the Crown to dispense with a strict compliance with the conditions of the act in relation to any Powers, like the United States, not having colonies, seemed necessarily to imply discussion, and consequently negotiation with such Powers. It is not the object, in bringing forward the facts and observations which have been stated in vindication of the American Government, to convey any reproaches against that of Great Britain on account of the late unexpected resolution which it has taken. These facts and observations, however, show that it ought not to excite any surprise that the Congress of the United States declined legislating on a matter which it appeared to them was both most fitting in itself and preferred by Great Britain to be settled by mutual and friendly arrangement. When deliberating on the only proposition which was made during their last session, that of a simple repeal of all discriminating duties, which it now appears would have been unavailing and would have fallen far short of British expectations, they were unaware that they were acting under the pains and penalties of a British act of Parliament suspended over their heads, a non-compliance with the strict conditions of which subjected the United States not only to the forfeiture of all intercourse with the British colonies, but was to be attended with the further consequence of terminating all negotiation even between the parties.

I will now proceed to a consideration of the specific conditions required by the act of Parliament, the non-fulfilment of which is the professed ground of the late British order in council. These conditions are understood to be contained in the fourth section of the act which begins by reciting, "And whereas, by the law of navigation, foreign ships are permitted to import into any of the British possessions abroad, from the countries to which they belong, goods the produce of those countries, and to export goods from such possessions to be carried to any foreign country whatever; and whereas it is expedient that such permission should be subject to certain conditions." It then proceeds to enact in respect to countries not having colonial possessions, "That the privileges thereby granted to foreign ships shall be limited to the ships of those countries (not having colonial possessions) which shall place the commerce and navigation of 'this country, and of its possessions abroad, upon the footing of the most favored nation,' unless his Majesty, by his order in council, shall, in any case, deem it expedient to grant the whole or any of such privileges to the ships of any foreign country, although the conditions aforesaid shalln ot, in all respects, be fulfilled by such foreign country." In considering this act of Parliament, the first circumstance which commands attention is the marked difference which it makes in the conditions required of foreign Powers, between those which have colonies and those which have none. From the colonial Powers it only demands that they should grant to British ships privileges of trading with their colonies, like those which the British law of navigation grants to those Powers of trading with the British colonies—that is to say, that such Powers should allow to British vessels the privilege of importing British produce into their colonies, and of exporting goods therefrom, to be carried to any country whatever except the parent country. But, from the Powers having no colonies, the act demands that they should place the commerce and navigation, both of the United Kingdom and its possessions abroad, upon the footing of the most favored nation. With the colonial Powers the act proposes an exchange of colonial trade for colonial trade, exclusive of the trade of the parent country. With Powers not having colonies it proposes to give the British colonial trade only in exchange for a trade between those Powers and the United Kingdom and all its possessions abroad. From the colonial Powers it asks nothing but mere reciprocity, which, viewing the vast extent of the British colonies in comparison with those of any other Power, is only nominal. The act, on the contrary, is not satisfied with demanding from the Powers having no colonies reciprocity of privileges, but it requires that, in consideration of the permission to import their produce into the British colonies, and to export therefrom produce of those colonies to any foreign country except Great Britain, those Powers should at once extend to the commerce and navigation of the United Kingdom and its possessions abroad the full measure of all commercial privileges which they may have granted to the most favored nation. It is impossible not to see that this discrimination, made by the act of Parliament between different foreign Powers, operates exclusively upon the United States. All the maritime States have colonies, and therefore will be let into the trade with the British colonies upon the less onerous conditions. The United States are the only Power not having colonies which trades, or is ever likely to trade, in any extent with British colonies. And if they alone had been named in the second class of Powers described in the act, the application of its more burdensome conditions would not, in that case, have been more exclusively confined to them. The trade of the United States will bear an advantageous comparison with the trade of any of the colonial Powers, either in its amount or the value or variety of the articles which it comprehends; is greatly superior to that of most of them, and justly entitles us to demand from Great Britain as favorable terms as those which are extended to any of them. It is true that the act holds out the idea of some mitigation of these conditions in the authority confided to the King. But on what considerations his Britannic Majesty might be induced, by his order in council, to exercise the dispensing power vested in him, is not stated in the act itself, nor have they been disclosed by any order in council, or in any other manner which has come to our knowledge. The very investment of such a power, I repeat, implied friendly explanations and discussions, and consequently the means of negotiation which the British Government now rejects as altogether inadmissible. Being, therefore, unable to ascertain the undivulged considerations which might have led to some relaxation or variation of the conditions of the act of Parliament, we are confined to an examination of those specific conditions themselves.

They require that the United States, to entitle themselves to the permission of importation and exportation which is granted by the British law of navigation, should place the commerce and navigation of the United Kingdom and of its possessions abroad upon the footing of the most favored nation. The first observation occurring is, that, at the very moment when the British Government is putting forth the new principle that the regulation of the trade of the parent country and of its colonies depends upon two rules essentially different, the one admitting and the other excluding all consultation with foreign States, this act confounds them together, and requires not merely that we should place the British colonies upon the footing of the most favored colonies, but that, to entitle us to enjoy the privileges of an intercourse with those colonies, we must comply with the requirement of placing the navigation and commerce, both of the parent country and all its possessions abroad, on the footing of the most favored nation.

The first difficulty which is encountered in ascertaining the precise nature and extent of the conditions prescribed by the act of Parliament is, that it furnishes no definition of the terms, "the most favored nation," which it employs. According to one interpretation of those terms, they import the gratuitous concession of commercial privileges; according to another, they imply the nation which enjoys the greatest amount of commercial privilege, whether granted with or without equivalents.

That the first was not the sense in which the British Government intended to use those terms we conjectured; because, if it were, nothing remained to be done by the American Government to bring itself within the conditions of the act of Parliament, and we apprehended that the British Government required some positive act. Great Britain, in that sense of the terms, is, in respect to the commerce and navigation both of the parent country and its possessions abroad, on the footing of the most favored nation. Whatever commercial privileges are granted by the United States to any foreign nation by act of Congress, or by treaties, are founded upon equivalents. Holding out the principle of fair reciprocity to all nations, we neither ask, nor profess to bestow, commercial boons. Thus, in respect to alien or discriminating duties, we have not abolished them in behalf of any nation which has not professed to abolish them as to us. If they are now levied upon British vessels coming to the United States from British colonies, countervailing duties are now also levied upon American vessels entering British colonies, and have been constantly, as Mr. Canning declares, from 1823. If the amount of American tonnage admitted to entry in British colonial ports, and of British tonnage entering American ports from British colonies, were exactly equal, the collection of duties on one side would neutralize the collection on the other. But, as there is much more American than British tonnage employed in the colonial trade, we pay a greater amount of those duties than Great Britain. And, consequently, if there were cause of complaint on either side, on account of their existence, it would be with us. It could not, therefore, have been in the first, but must have been in the second, meaning of the terms that they are employed in the act of Parliament.

Great Britain is understood, then, to have demanded that the United Kingdom and its possessions abroad should be allowed to enjoy, in the ports of the United States, the greatest extent of commercial privileges which we have granted, no matter upon what ample equivalent, to any foreign nation whatever. In order to ascertain the latitude of concession thus required, it is necessary to glance, and it shall be done as rapidly as possible, at the state of our commercial relations with other foreign powers.

By the general law of navigation (see 6th vol. of the Laws of the United States, page 180) it is enacted that, after the 30th day of September, 1818, "no goods, wares, or merchandise shall be imported into the United States from any foreign port or place, except in vessels of the United States, or in such foreign vessels as truly and wholly belong to the citizens or subjects of that country of which the goods are the growth, production, or manufacture, or from which such goods, wares, or merchandise can only be, or most usually are, first shipped for transportation; provided, nevertheless, that this regulation shall not extend to the vessels of any foreign nation which has not adopted, and which shall not adopt, a similar regulation."

Great Britain had, long prior to the passage of that act, adopted, and continues to enforce, the restriction on which it is founded; whilst almost all other nations have abstained from incorporating it in their navigation codes. A vessel, therefore, of the United States on entering a British port being limited by British law to the introduction of goods the produce of the United States, a British vessel on entering their ports is limited to the introduction of goods being of British produce; whilst the vessels of all other nations which have not adopted the restrictive regulation are allowed, on entering a port of the United States, to introduce any foreign produce whatever by paying the alien and discriminating duties, from which vessels of the United States are exempted.

By particular arrangements with various Powers, some by treaty, and others by separate but reciprocal acts of the Governments of the United States and those Powers, the alien duties of the United States are abolished as to them; and their vessels and those of the United States are allowed the reciprocal liberty of importation and exportation at the same rate of duty upon both ship and cargo.

Thus, by the act of Congress of January, 1824, "so much of the several acts imposing duties on the tonnage of vessels in the ports of the United States as imposes a discriminating duty between foreign vessels and vessels of the United States is hereby suspended, so far as respects vessels truly and wholly belonging to subjects or citizens of the Kingdom of the Netherlands, of Prussia, of the Imperial Hanseatic cities of Hamburg, Lubec, and Bremen, of the Dukedom of Oldenburg, of the Kingdom of Norway, of the Kingdom of Sardinia, and of the Empire of Russia." And it enacts a like suspension of the discriminating duties on the cargo of any of the vessels of those several countries.

But it further enacts that the suspension of those duties shall "continue in behalf of each of the abovementioned nations, on condition that, and so long as, the vessels of the United States, and truly and wholly belonging to the citizens thereof, and all goods and merchandise of the produce and manufacture thereof, laden therein and imported into any of the said nations in Europe, respectively, shall be exempted from all and every discriminating duty of impost or tonnage, direct or indirect, whatsoever, other or higher than is levied upon the vessels and merchandise therein imported belonging to the subjects or citizens of each of the said nations respectively."

Thus, therefore, to comply with the conditions of the act of Parliament, we must, 1st, have allowed British vessels to import into the United States the produce of any foreign country whatever upon the payment of the alien duties, although vessels of the United States are and should have remained prohibited to import into British ports like produce upon any terms whatever; and, 2d, we must have abolished or suspended our discriminating duties, placing Great Britain upon the footing of the most favored nation, in whose behalf we had abolished or suspended them, although it now appears, from the averment of Mr. Canning, that duties of at least an equal amount have been, since the adoption of the order in council in the year 1823, and now are levied upon American vessels and their cargoes in British colonial ports.

So stood our law, and such must have been our compliance with the conditions of the act of Parliament at the time of its passage. But we suppose it to have been the understanding of the British Government, that if subsequent to that period we should grant to any foreign nation still greater privileges than those above described, by treaty or otherwise, in consideration of equivalents or not, such more extensive privileges must have immediately accrued to the United Kingdom and its possessions abroad, upon the rule of the most favored nation, or we must have subjected ourselves to the forfeiture of the colonial trade denounced by the act of Parliament.

Now, subsequently to the date of that act, to wit: on the 6th December last, we concluded a treaty with the Republic of the Federation of the Centre of America, which, having been afterwards ratified by both parties, is now in full operation. By this treaty it is stipulated that whatever can be exported from or imported into either country in its own vessels, to or from any foreign place whatever, may in like manner be exported or imported in the vessels of the other country, the vessel and the cargo paying in both cases the same and no higher duties, and consequently neither paying the alien duties. If we had entitled ourselves, by the fulfilment of the required conditions, to an intercourse with the British colonies, we would now be obliged, in order to retain the right to that intercourse, to allow British vessels, both of the parent country and its possessions abroad, a liberty of exportation and importation co-extensive with that of the vessels of the United States, although the interdict of the British law of navigation should remain in full operation on the vessels of the United States.

If we are mistaken in the extent of the concessions required by the British Government to place the United Kingdom and its possessions abroad on the footing of the most favored nation, the best and most friendly mode of correcting our error would have been to have accompanied an official communication of the act of Parliament with a full and frank explanation of those conditions, the performance of which, on our part, would have satisfied that Government. By withholding all explanation, if the Congress of the United States had legislated on that subject at its last session, it must have acted either, 1st, upon the exposition of the conditions of the act of Parliament now given; or, 2d, upon the views of the British Government as disclosed in the negotiations of 1824. It could not have conformed to the conditions of the act of Parliament, as we understand them, without a manifest sacrifice of the interests of the people of the United States, and an abandonment of those principles of reciprocity for which they have ever contended in all their negotiations with foreign powers. It now appears that it would have been unavailing if Congress had legislated in compliance with the views of the British Government as presented in the negotiations of 1824. According to those views, that Government was then willing that the trade between the colonies and the United States should continue restricted, as it then was by the laws of the two countries, to the direct intercourse—that is to say, that a British vessel clearing from the United States for a colonial port should be bound to land its cargo in that port, and an American vessel clearing from the colonies for the United States should be bound to land its cargo in them. But without any intimation to us, through the regular diplomatic channels, of an alteration in her views, Great Britain has now changed them, and on the 11th September, 1826, for the first time, announces her determination not "to consent to enter into any renewed negotiation upon the intercourse between the United States and the British colonies, so long as the pretension (the above restriction as to the direct intercourse) recorded in the act of 1823, and there applied to British colonies alone, remains part of the law of the United States." And we are also given to understand "that the British Government further owes it to the spirit of frankness, which it wishes to cultivate in all its relations with the United States, to declare that, after having been compelled to apply to any country the interdict prescribed by the act of 1825, the British Government cannot hold itself bound to remove that interdict, as a matter of course, whenever it may happen to suit the convenience of the foreign Government to reconsider the measures by which the application of that interdict was occasioned." The pretension referred to is the exact counterpart of a similar pre-existing pretension contained in the act of Parliament of 1822. The British Government does not appear to have reflected that its rejection of all negotiation on the subject deprives it of the best of the only two modes of getting rid of the exceptionable restriction.

From what has been now advanced it has been established, 1st, that the colonial trade was a fit subject for the adjustment, by friendly negotiation between the two Powers, of the conditions on which it should be carried on; 2d, that it has been long and often, in fact, a subject of negotiation between them; and, 3d, that the American Government was bound to conclude, from everything which passed between the two Governments, that both parties entertained the expectation that it was to be arranged by negotiation, and only by negotiation. It was under this full conviction that your general instructions were prepared.

What may be the nature of the proposals which you were authorized to make upon the renewal of the negotiation so confidently anticipated it is not now proper should be communicated to the British Government. Respect for ourselves, no less than for that Government, forbids that we should obtrude upon their consideration proposals against which they have deemed it proper to shut their ears. It will be, however, no violation of that respect to say that they were of a character, on all the disputed points between the two Governments, authorizing us to believe that they would be satisfactory.

The Government of the United States is animated by the sincerest desire to maintain with that of Great Britain, not merely the forms of courtesy and amity, but to cultivate a cordial and lasting friendship; to settle every controverted question between them upon principles of justice and reciprocity, and, by an enlarged liberality in their mutual intercourse, to advance the real prosperity of both. Entertaining this desire, it has learnt with the most lively regret the resolution of the British Government to close the door against those friendly explanations and that frank and mutual exposition of the wishes and views of the parties which are, or should be, the object of all negotiation. The harmony of nations requires that every avenue to such explanations should always be kept fully open. But such a free access on all questions appears to the Government of the United States to be especially desirable between two such nations as Great Britain and the United States, whose interests and happiness are so intimately interwoven. By rejecting the ordinary mode of treating through the established agency of accredited ministers, and substituting to it that of mutual legislation, which, after all, is but another though less advantageous mode of negotiation, we deprive ourselves of many facilities. Congress and the British Parliament are numerous bodies, acting in different and distant spheres, and it is not derogating from their undoubted wisdom and superior intelligence to suppose that their organization is not the best suited to the exercise of diplomatic functions in all cases.

A single word of explanation, an instantaneous suggestion of the modification of a proposal elicited in conference, may lead to the adjustment of a difference, when ministers are treating face to face, which might not be settled for a long time in a negotiation conducted between two bodies, each composed of several hundred members, separated by the Atlantic Ocean. We do not mean to bring forward any formal complaint against Great Britain on account of her determination to exclude one of the means which experience has evinced to be best adapted to the accommodation of national differences. Our main purpose is to show that the United States are not justly chargeable with the consequences which may flow from that most unexpected decision.

As the only alternative which the course adopted by that Government has left, the President has determined to give a signal proof of his anxious wish to preserve a good understanding between the two Governments by laying the whole of the correspondence which has passed between them on this subject, including the instructions to our several ministers at the Court of St. James, before Congress at its next session. The wisdom of that body in the actual state of things is alone competent to decide whether the colonial intercourse shall remain closed, according to the pleasure of the British Government, as manifested in the late order in council, and whether that portion of it left open by the order shall remain open, or on what conditions compatible with the interests of the people of the United States Congress is willing the trade should be placed.

You will accompany the communication of the substance of this despatch, or the substance of such part of it as you may not have anticipated in any answer to Mr. Canning's note presented from yourself to the British Government, with the assurance that, notwithstanding their present decision, the Government of the United State at all times hereafter will be ready, at Washington or at London, to treat of the colonial intercourse whenever it may be their desire or inclination to negotiate on that subject.

I am, with great respect, your obedient servant,

H. CLAY.

ALBERT GALLATIN, Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States, London.

General Convention of Friendship, Commerce, and Navigation, between the United States of America and his Majesty the King of Denmark.

BY THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

A PROCLAMATION.

Whereas a general convention of friendship, commerce, and navigation, between the United States and his Majesty the King of Denmark, was concluded and signed at Washington, on the twenty-sixth day of April last, by Henry Clay, Secretary of State of the United States, on the part of the United States, and Peter Pedersen, minister resident from Denmark, on the part of Denmark, the respective plenipotentiaries of the two Powers: And whereas the said convention has been duly and respectively ratified by me, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate of the United States, and by his Majesty the King of Denmark, and the ratifications of the same have been exchanged on the tenth day of August last, at the City of Copenhagen, by John Rainals, Consul of the United States, on the part of the United States, and Count Schimelmann, Minister of Foreign Affairs of his Majesty the King of Denmark, on the part of Denmark, which convention is in the words following, to wit:

General Convention of Friendship, Commerce, and Navigation, between the United States of America and his Majesty the King of Denmark.

The United States of America and his Majesty the King of Denmark, being desirous to make firm and permanent the peace and friendship which happily prevail between the two nations, and to extend the commercial relations which subsist between their respective territories and people, have agreed to fix, in a manner clear and positive, the rules which shall, in future, be observed between the one and the other party, by means of a general convention of friendship, commerce, and navigation. With that object, the President of the United States of America has conferred full powers on Henry Clay, their Secretary of State, and his Majesty the King of Denmark has conferred like powers on Peter Pedersen, his Privy Counsellor of Legation, and minister resident near the said States, Knight of the Dannebrog, who, after having exchanged their said full powers, found to be in due and proper form, have agreed to the following articles:

ARTICLE 1. The contracting parties, desiring to live in peace and harmony with all the other nations of the earth by means of a policy frank and equally friendly with all, engage mutually not to grant any particular favor to other nations, in respect of commerce and navigation, which shall not immediately become common to the other party, who shall enjoy the same freely if the concession were freely made, or on allowing the same compensation if the concession were conditional.

ARTICLE 2. The contracting parties being likewise desirous of placing the commerce and navigation of their respective countries on the liberal basis of perfect equality and reciprocity, mutually agree that the citizens and subjects of each may frequent all the coasts and countries of the other, (with the exception hereafter provided for in the sixth article,) and reside and trade there in all kinds of produce, manufactures, and merchandise; and they shall enjoy all the rights, privileges, and exemptions, in navigation and commerce, which native citizens or subjects do or shall enjoy, submitting themselves to the laws, decrees, and usages there established, to which native citizens or subjects are subjected. But it is understood that this article does not include the coasting trade of either country, the regulation of which is reserved by the parties, respectively, according to their own separate laws.

ARTICLE 3. They likewise agree that whatever kind of produce, manufacture, or merchandise, of any foreign country can be from time to time lawfully imported into the United States in vessels belonging wholly to the citizens thereof, may be also imported in vessels wholly belonging to the subjects of Denmark; and that no higher or other duties upon the tonnage of the vessel or her cargo shall be levied and collected, whether the importation be made in vessels of the one country or of the other. And, in like manner, that whatever kind of produce, manufacture, or merchandise, of any foreign country can be from time to time lawfully imported into the dominions of the King of Denmark in the vessels thereof, (with the exception hereafter mentioned in the sixth article,) may be also imported in vessels of the United States; and that no higher or other duties upon the tonnage of the vessel or her cargo shall be levied and collected, whether the importation be made in vessels of the one country or of the other. And they further agree that whatever may be lawfully exported or re-exported from the one country in its own vessels to any foreign country, may in like manner be exported or re-exported in the vessels of the other country. And the same bounties, duties, and drawbacks shall be allowed and collected, whether such exportation or re-exportation be made in vessels of the United States or of Denmark. Nor shall higher or other charges of any kind be imposed in the ports of one party on vessels of the other than are or shall be payable in the same ports by native vessels.

ARTICLE 4. No higher or other duties shall be imposed on the importation into the United States of any article the produce or manufacture of the dominions of his Majesty the King of Denmark, and no higher or other duties shall be imposed on the importation into the said dominions of any article the produce or manufacture of the United States than are, or shall be, payable on the like articles, being the produce or manufacture of any other foreign country. Nor shall any higher or other duties or charges be imposed in either of the two countries on the exportation of any articles to the United States, or to the dominions of his Majesty the King of Denmark, respectively, than such as are, or may be, payable on the exportation of the like articles to any other foreign country. Nor shall any prohibition be imposed on the exportation or importation of any articles the produce or manufacture of the United States, or of the dominions of his Majesty the King of Denmark, to or from the territories of the United States, or to or from the said dominions, which shall not equally extend to all other nations.

ARTICLE 5. Neither the vessels of the United States nor their cargoes shall, when they pass the Sound or the Belts, pay higher or other duties than those which are, or may be, paid by the most favored nation.

ARTICLE 6. The present convention shall not apply to the northern possessions of his Majesty the King of Denmark—that is to say, Iceland, the Feroe islands, and Greenland—nor to places situated beyond the Cape of Good Hope, the right to regulate the direct intercourse with which possessions and places is reserved by the parties, respectively. And it is further agreed that this convention is not to extend to the direct trade between Denmark and the West India colonies of his Danish Majesty; but, in the intercourse with those colonies it is agreed that whatever can be lawfully imported into, or exported from, the said colonies in the vessels of one party, from or to the ports of the United States, or from or to the ports of any other foreign country, may in like manner, and with the same duties and charges applicable to vessel and cargo, be imported into, or exported from, the said colonies in vessels of the other party.

ARTICLE 7. The United States and his Danish Majesty mutually agree that no higer or other duties, charges, or taxes, of any kind, shall be levied in the territories or dominions of either party upon any personal property, money, or effects, of their respective citizens or subjects, on the removal of the same from their territories or dominions reciprocally, either upon the inheritance of such property, money, or effects, or otherwise, than are, or shall be, payable in each State upon the same when removed by a citizen or subject of such State, respectively.

ARTICLE 8. To make more effectual the protection which the United States and his Danish Majesty shall afford, in future, to the navigation and commerce of their respective citizens and subjects, they agree mutually to receive and admit Consuls and Vice Consuls in all the ports open to foreign commerce, who shall enjoy in them all the rights, privileges, and immunities, of the Consuls and Vice Consuls of the most favored nation, each contracting party, however, remaining at liberty to except those ports and places in which the admission and residence of such Consuls may not seem convenient.

ARTICLE 9. In order that the Consuls and Vice Consuls of the contracting parties may enjoy the rights, privileges, and immunities, which belong to them, by their public character, they shall, before entering on the exercise of their functions, exhibit their commission or patent in due form to the Government to which they are accredited; and having obtained their exequatur, which shall be granted gratis, they shall be held and considered as such by all the authorities, magistrates, and inhabitants in the consular district in which they reside.

ARTICLE 10. It is likewise agreed that the Consuls and persons attached to their necessary service, they not being natives of the country in which the Consul resides, shall be exempt from all public service, and also from all kind of taxes, imposts, and contributions, except those which they shall be obliged to pay on account of commerce or their property, to which inhabitants, native and foreign, of the country in which such Consuls reside, are subject, being in everything besides subject to the laws of the respective States. The archives and papers of the consulate shall be respected inviolably, and under no pretext whatever shall any magistrate seize or in any way interfere with them.

ARTICLE 11. The present convention shall be in force for ten years from the date thereof, and, further, until the end of one year after either of the contracting parties shall have given notice to the other of its intention to terminate the same: each of the contracting parties reserving to itself the right of giving such notice to the other at the end of the said term of ten years; and it is hereby agreed between them that, on the expiration of one year after such notice shall have been received by either from the other party, this convention, and all the provisions thereof, shall altogether cease and determine.

ARTICLE. 12. This convention shall be approved and ratified by the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate thereof, and by his Majesty the King of Denmark, and the ratifications shall be exchanged in the City of Copenhagen within eight months from the date of the signature hereof, or sooner if possible.

In faith whereof, we, the plenipotentiaries of the United States of America and of his Danish Majesty, have signed and sealed these presents.

Done in triplicate, at the City of Washington, on the twenty-sixth day of April, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and twenty-six, in the fiftieth year of the Independence of the United States of America.

H. CLAY.
PR. PEDERSEN.

Now, therefore, be it known that I, JOHN QUINCY ADAMS, President of the United States, have caused the said convention to be made public, to the end that the same, and every clause and article thereof, may be observed and fulfilled with good faith by the United States and the citizens thereof.

In witness whereof, I have hereunto set my hand and caused the seal of the United States to be affixed.

Done at the City of Washington this fourteenth day of October, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and twenty-six, and of the Independence of the United States the fifty-first.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

By the President:
H. CLAY, Secretary of State.

ADDENDUM.

Mr. Clay to Mr. Pedersen.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, April 25, 1826.

The undersigned, Secretary of State of the United States, by direction of the President thereof, has the honor to state to Mr. Pedersen, minister resident of his Majesty the King of Denmark, that it would have been satisfactory to the Government of the United States if Mr. Pedersen had been charged with instructions, in the negotiation which has just terminated, to treat of the indemnities to citizens of the United States, in consequence of the seizure, detention, and comdemnation of their property in the ports of his Danish Majesty. But as he has no instructions to that effect, the undersigned is directed, at and before proceeding to the signature of the treaty of friendship, commerce, and navigation, on which they have agreed, explicitly to declare that the omission to provide for those indemnities is not hereafter to be interpreted as a waiver or abandonment of them by the Government of the United States, which, on the contrary, is firmly resolved to persevere in the pursuit of them until they shall be finally arranged upon principles of equity and justice. And to guard against any misconception of the fact of the silence of the treaty in the above particular, or of the views of the American Government, the undersigned requests that Mr. Pedersen will transmit this official declaration to the Government of Denmark. And he avails himself of this occasion to tender to Mr. Pedersen assurances of his distinguished consideration.

H. CLAY.

The Chevalier PEDERSEN, Minister resident from Denmark.

The Chevalier Peter Pedersen to Mr. Clay.

WASHINGTON, April 25, 1826.

The undersigned, minister resident of his Majesty the King of Denmark, has the honor herewith to acknowledge having received Mr. Clay's official note of this day, declaratory of the advanced claims against Denmark not being waived on the part of the United States by the convention agreed upon and about to be signed, which note he, as requested, will transmit to his Government. And he avails himself of this occasion to renew to Mr. Clay assurances of his distinguished consideration.

P. PEDERSEN.

ARTICULO 3. Los dos altas partes contratantes deseando tambien establecer el comercio y navegacion de sus respectivos paises sobre las liberales bases de perfecta igualidad y reciprocidad, convienen mutuamente que los ciudadanos de cada una podran frecuentar todas las costas y paises de la otra y residir i traficar en ellos con toda clase de producciones, manufacturas, i mercaderias, i gozaran de todos los derechos, privilegios y esempciones con respecto à navegacion i comercio que gozan ó gozaren los ciudadanos nativos, sometiendose à las leyes, decretos é usos establecidos à que estan sujetos dichos ciudadanos nativos. Pero deber entenderse que este articulo no comprende el comercio de costa de cada uno de los dos paises, cuya regulacion es reservada à las partes, respectivamente, segun sus propias i peculiares leyes.

ARTICULO 4. Igualmente convienen, que cualquiera clase de producciones, manufacturas ó mercaderias estrangeras que puedan ser, en cualquier tiempo, legalmente introducidas en la Republica Central en sus propios buques, puedan tambien ser introducidas Federation of the Centre of America; and that no higher or other duties upon the tonnage of the vessel or her cargo shall be levied and collected, whether the importation be made in vessels of the one country or of the other. And in like manner that whatever kind of produce, manufactures, or merchandise, of any foreign country, can be from time to time lawfully imported into the Central Republic in its own vessels, may be also imported in vessels of the United States; and that no higher or other duties upon the tonnage of the vessel or her cargo shall be levied and collected, whether the importation be made in vessels of the one country or of the other. And they further agree that whatever may be lawfully exported or re-exported from the one country in its own vessels to any foreign country, may in like manner be exported or re-exported in the vessels of the other country. And the same bounties, duties, and drawbacks, shall be allowed and collected, whether such exportation or re-exportation be made in vessels of the United States or of the Central Republic.

ARTICLE 5. No higher or other duties shall be imposed on the importation into the United States of any articles the produce or manufactures of the Federation of the Centre of America, and no higher or other duties shall be imposed on the importation into the Federaton of the Centre of America of any articles the produce or manufactures of the United States than are or shall be payable on the like articles being the produce or manufactures of any other foreign country; nor shall any higher or other duties or charges be imposed in either of the two countries on the exportation of any articles to the United States or to the Federation of the Centre of America, respectively, than such as are payable on the exportation of the like articles to any other foreign country; nor shall any prohibition be imposed on the exportation or importation of any articles the produce or manufactures of the United States or of the Federation of the Centre of America to or from the territories of the United States, or to or from the territories of the Federation of the Centre of America, which shall not equally extend to all other nations.

ARTICLE 6. It is likewise agreed that it shall be wholly free for all merchants, commanders of ships, and other citizens, of both countries, to manage, themselves, their own business, in all the ports and places subject to the jurisdiction of each other, as well with respect to the consignment and sale of their goods and merchandise, by wholesale or retail, as with respect to the loading, unloading, and sending off their ships; they being, in all these cases, to be treated as citizens of the country in which they reside, or at least to be placed on a footing with the subjects or citizens of the most favored nation.

ARTICLE 7. The citizens of neither of the contracting parties shall be liable to any embargo, nor be detained with their vessels, cargoes, merchandise, or effects, for any military expedition, nor for any public or private purpose whatever, without allowing to those interested a sufficient indemnification.

ARTICLE 8. Whenever the citizens of either of the contracting parties shall be forced to seek refuge or asylum in the rivers, bays, ports, or dominions of the other with their vessels, whether merchant or of war, public or private, through stress of weather, pursuit of pirates, or enemies, they shall be received and treated with humanity, giving to them all favor and protection for repairing their ships, procuring provisions, and placing themselves in a situation to continue their voyage without obstacle or hindrance of any kind.

ARTICLE 9. All the ships, merchandise, and effects belonging to the citizens of the contracting parties, which may be captured by pirates, whether within the limits of its jurisdiction or on the high seas, and may be carried or found in the rivers, roads, bays, ports, or en los buques de los Estados-Unidos; i que no se impondran ó cobraran otros ó mayores derechos de tonelada ó por el cargamento, ya sea que la importacion se haga en buques de la una ó de la otra. De la misma manera que cualesquiera clase de producciones, manufacturas ó mercaderias estrangeras que pueden ser en cualquier tiempo legalmente introducidas en los Estados-Unidos en sus propios buques, puedan tambien ser introducidas en los buques de la Federacion de Centro-America; i que no se impondran ó cobraran otros ó mayores derechos de tonelada ó por el cargamento ya sea que la importacion se haga en buques de la una ó de la otra. Convienen ademas, que todo lo que pueda ser legalmente esportado ó re-esportado de uno de los dos paises, en sus buques propios para un pais estranjero pueda de la misma manera ser esportado ó re-esportado en los buques de el otro. Y los mismos derechos, premios ó descuentos se concederan i cobraran ya sea que tal exportacion, ó re-esportacion se haga en los buques de la Republica Central ó de los Estados-Unidos.

ARTICULO 5. No se impondran otros ó mayores derechos sobre la importacion de cualquier articulo, produccion ó manufactura de los Estados-Unidos en la Federacion de Centro-America, i no se impondran otros ó mayores derechos sobre la importacion de cualquier articulo, produccion ó manufactura de la Federacion de Centro-America en los Estados-Unidos, que los que se pagan ó pagaren en adelante por iguales articulos, produccion ó manufactura de cualquiera pais estrangero; ni se impondran otros ó mayores derechos ó cargas en cualquiera de los dos paises sobre la esportacion de cualesquiera articulos para la Federacion de Centro-America ó para los Estados-Unidos respectivamente, que los que, se pagan ó pagaren en adelante por la esportacion de iguales articulos para cualquiera otro pais estrangero; ni se establecera prohivicion sobre la importacion ó esportacion de cualesquiera articulos, produccion ó manufactura de los territorios de la Federacion de Centro-America para los de los Estados-Unidos, ó de los territorios de los Estados-Unidos para los de la Federacion de Centro-America, que no sea igualmente estensiva á las otras naciones.

ARTICULO 6. Se conviene ademas, que serà enteramente libre y permitido, a los comerciantes, comandantes de buques y otros Ciudadanos de ambos paises el manejar sus negocios, por si mismos, en todos los puertos y lugares sujetos à la jurisdiccion de uno ù otro, asi respecto à las consignaciones y ventas por mayor y menor de sus efectos y mercaderias, como de la carga, descarga y despacho de sus buques, debiendo en todos estos casos, ser tratados como ciudadanos del pais en que residan, ó al menos puestos sobre un pic igual con los subditos ó ciudadanos de las naciones mas favorecidas.

ARTICULO 7. Los ciudadanos de una ù otra parte, no podràn ser embargados ni detenidos con sus embarcaciones, tripulaciones, mercaderias, y efectos comerciales de su pertenencia, para alguna espedicion militàr, usos publicos, ó particulares cualesquiera que sean, sin conceder à los interesados una suficiente indemnizacion.

ARTICULO 8. Siempre que los ciudadanos de alguna de las partes contratantes se vieren precisados à buscàr refujio, ó asilo en los rios, bahias, puertos, ó dominios de la otra, con sus buques, ya sean mercantes, ó de guerra, publicos, ó particulares, por mal tiempo, persecucion de piratas ó enemigos, seràn recibidos y tratados con humanidad, dandoles todo favor y proteccion, para reparar sus buques, procuràr viveres, y ponerse en situacion de continuar su viaje, sin obstaculo ó estorbo de ningun genero.

ARTICULO 9. Todos los buques, mercaderias y efectos pertenecientes a los ciudadanos de una de las partes contratantes, que sean apresados por piratas, bien sea dentro de los limites de su jurisdiccion, ó en alta mar, y fueren llevados, ó hallados en los rios, dominions of the other, shall be delivered up to the owners, they proving, in due and proper form, their rights before the competent tribunals; it being well understood that the claim should be made within the term of one year by the parties themselves, their attorneys, or agents of the respective Governments.

ARTICLE 10. When any vessel belonging to the citizens of either of the contracting parties shall be wrecked, foundered, or shall suffer any damage on the coasts or within the dominions of the other, there shall be given to them all assistance and protection, in the same manner which is usual and customary with the vessels of the nation where the damage happens, permitting them to unload the said vessel, if necessary, of its merchandise and effects, without exacting for it any duty, impost, or contribution whatever, until they may be exported.

ARTICLE 11. The citizens of each of the contracting parties shall have power to dispose of their personal goods within the jurisdiction of the other by sale, donation, testament, or otherwise, and their representatives, being citizens of the other party, shall succeed to their said personal goods, whether by testament or ab intestato; and they may take possession thereof, either by themselves or others acting for them, and dispose of the same at their will, paying such dues only as the inhabitants of the country, wherein said goods are, shall be subject to pay in like cases. And if, in the case of real estate, the said heirs would be prevented from entering into the possession of the inheritance on account of their character of aliens, there shall be granted to them the term of three years to dispose of the same as they may think proper, and to withdraw the proceeds without molestation, and exempt from all duties of detraction, on the part of the Government of the respective States.

ARTICLE 12. Both the contracting parties promise and engage formally to give their special protection to the persons and property of the citizens of each other, of all occupations, who may be in the territories, subject to the jurisdiction of the one or the other, transient or dwelling therein, leaving open and free to them the tribunals of justice for their judicial recourse, on the same terms which are usual and customary with the natives or citizens of the country in which they may be; for which they may employ, in defence of their rights, such advocates, solicitors, notaries, agents, and factors, as they may judge proper, in all their trials at law; and such citizens or agents shall have free opportunity to be present at the decisions and sentences of the tribunals in all cases which may concern them, and likewise at the taking of all examinations and evidence which may be exhibited in the said trials.

ARTICLE 13. It is likewise agreed that the most perfect and entire security of conscience shall be enjoyed by the citizens of both the contracting parties in the countries subject to the jurisdiction of the one and the other, without their being liable to be disturbed or molested on account of their religious belief, so long as they respect the laws and established usages of the country. Moreover, the bodies of the citizens of one of the contracting parties, who may die in the territories of the other, shall be buried in the usual burying grounds or in other decent or suitable places, and shall be protected from violation or disturbance.

ARTICLE 14. It shall be lawful for the citizens of the United States of America and of the Federation of the Centre of America to sail with their ships, with all manner of liberty and security, no distinction being made who are the proprietors of the merchandise laden thereon, from any port to the places of those who are now, or hereafter shall be, at enmity with either of the contracting parties. It shall likewise be lawful for the citizens aforesaid to sail with the ships and merchandise before mentioned, and to trade with the same liberty and security, radas, bahias, puertos, ó dominios de la otra, seràn entregados à sus dueños probando estos en la forma propia y debida sus derechos ante los tribunales competentes; bien entendido que el reclamo ha de hacerse dentro del termino de un año, por las mismas partes, sus apoderados ó agentes de los respectivos Gobiernos.

ARTICULO 10. Cuando algun buque perteneciente à los ciudadanos de alguna de las partes contratantes, naufrague, encalle, ó sufra alguna averia, en las costas, ó dentro de los dominios de la otra, se les darà toda ayuda y proteccion, del mismo modo que es uso y costumbre, con los buques de la nacion en donde suceda la averia: permitiendoles descargàr el dicho buque (si fuere necesario) de sus mercaderias y efectos, sin cobrar por esto hasta que sean esportados, ningun derecho, impuesto ó contribucion.

ARTICULO 11. Los ciudadanos de cada una de las partes contratantes tendrán pleno podér para disponér de sus bienes personales dentro de la jurisdiccion de la otra, por venta, donacion, testamento, ó de otro modo; y sus representantes, siendo ciudadanos de la otra parte, succederán á sus dichos bienes personales, ya sea por testamento ó ab intestato, y podran tomar posesion de ellos, ya sea por si mismos ó por otros, que obren por ellos, y disponer de los mismos, segun su voluntad, pagando aquellas cargas, solamente, que los habitantes del pais en donde estan los referidos bienes, estuvieren sujetos á pagar en iguales casos. Y si en el caso de bienes raices, los dichos herederos fuesen impedidos de entrár en la posesion de la herencia por razon de su caracter de estrangeros, se les dará el termino de tres años para disponer de ella como juzguen conveniente, y para estraér el producto sin molestia, y esentos de todo derecho de deduccion, por parte del Gobierno de los respectivos Estados.

ARTICULO 12. Ambas partes contratantes se compremeten y obligan formalmente á dar su proteccion especial á las personas y propiedades de los ciudadanos de cada una reciprocamente transeuntes ó habitantes de todas ocupaciones, en los territorios sujetos á la jurisdiccion de una y otra, dejandoles abiertos y libres los tribunales de justicia, para sus recursos judiciales, en los mismos terminos que son de uso y costumbre para los naturales ó ciudadanos del pais en que residan; para lo cual, podrán emplear en defensa de sus derechos aquellos abogados, procuradores, escribanos, agentes, ó factores que juzguen convenientes, en todos sus asuntos y litigios; y dichos ciudadanos ó agentes tendrán la libre facultad de estar presentes en las decisiones y sentencias de los tribunales, en todos los casos que les conciernan, como igualmente al tomar todos los examenes y declaraciones que se ofrezcan en los dichos litigios.

ARTICULO 13. Se conviene igualmente en que los ciudadanos de ambas partes contratantes gozen la mas perfecta y entera seguridad de conciencia en los paises sujetos á la jurisdiccion da una ù otra, sin quedar por ello espuestos á ser inquietados ó molestados en razon de su creencia religiosa, meintras que respeten las leyes y usos establecidos. Ademas de esto, podrán sepultarse los cadaveres de los ciudadanos de una de las partes contratantes, que fallecieren en los territorios de la otra, en los cementerios acostumbrados, ó en otros lugares decentes, y adecuados, los cuales, serán protejidos contra toda violacion ó trastorno.

ARTICULO 14. Será licito a los ciudadanos de la Federacion de Centro-America, y de los Estados-Unidos de America, navegár con sus buques, con toda seguridad y libertad, de cualquiera puertó á las plazas ó lugares de los que son ó fueren en adelante enemigos de cualquiera de las dos partes contratantes, sin hacerse distincion de quienes son los dueños de las mercaderias cargadas en ellos. Será igualmente licito á las referidos ciudadanos navegár con sus buques y mercaderias mencionadas y traficár con la misma libertad y seguridad, de los lugares, from the places, ports, and havens, of those who are enemies of both or either party, without any opposition or disturbance whatsoever, not only directly from the places of the enemy, before mentioned, to neutral places, but also from one place belonging to an enemy to another place belonging to an enemy, whether they be under the jurisdiction of one Power or under several. And it is hereby stipulated that free ships shall also give freedom to goods, and that everything shall be deemed to be free and exempt which shall be found on board the ships belonging to the citizens of either of the contracting parties, although the whole lading, or any part thereof, should appertain to the enemies of either, contraband goods being always excepted. It is also agreed, in like manner, that the same liberty be extended to persons who are on board a free ship with this effect, that, although they be enemies to both or either party, they are not to be taken out of that free ship unless they are officers or soldiers and in the actual service of the enemies: Provided, however, and it is hereby agreed, that the stipulations in this article contained, declaring that the flag shall cover the property, shall be understood as applying to those Powers only who recognize this principle; but if either of the two contracting parties shall be at war with a third, and the other neutral, the flag of the neutral shall cover the property of the enemies whose Governments acknowledge this principle and not of others.

ARTICLE 15. It is likewise agreed that, in the case where the neutral flag of one of the contracting parties shall protect the property of the enemies of the other by virtue of the above stipulation, it shall always be understood that the neutral property found on board such enemy's vessels shall be held and considered as enemy's property, and as such shall be liable to detention and confiscation, except such property as was put on board such vessel before the declaration of war or even afterwards, if it were done without the knowledge of it; but the contracting parties agree that two months having elapsed after the declaration, their citizens shall not plead ignorance thereof. On the contrary, if the flag of the neutral does not protect the enemy's property, in that case the goods and merchandise of the neutral embarked in such enemy's ships shall be free.

ARTICLE 16. This liberty of navigation and commerce shall extend to all kinds of merchandise, excepting those only which are distinguished by the name of contraband, and under this name of contraband or prohibited goods shall be comprehended:

1. Cannons, mortars, howitzers, swivels, blunderbusses, muskets, fuzees, rifles, carbines, pistols, pikes, swords, sabres, lances, spears, halberds, and grenades, bombs, powder, matches, balls, and all other things belonging to the use of these arms.

2. Bucklers, helmets, breast-plates, coats of mail, infantry belts, and clothes made up in the form and for a military use.

3. Cavalry belts and horses, with their furniture.

4. And generally all kinds of arms, and instruments of iron, steel, brass, and copper, or of any other materials manufactured, prepared and formed expressly to make war by sea or land.

ARTICLE 17. All other merchandise, and things not comprehended in the articles of contraband explicitly enumerated and classified as above, shall be held and considered as free, and subjects of free and lawful commerce, so that they may be carried and transported in the freest manner by both the contracting parties, even to places belonging to an enemy, excepting only those places which are at that time besieged or blockaded; and to avoid all doubt in this particular, it is declared that those places only puertos y enseñadas de los enemigos de ambas partes, ó de alguna de ellas, sin ninguna oposicion, ó disturbio cualquiera, no solo directamente de los lugares de enemigo arriba mencionados á lugares neutros, sino tambien de un lugar perteneciente á un enemigo, á otro enemigo, ya sea que esten bajo la jurisdiccion de una potencia, ó bajo la de diversas. Y queda aqui estipulado, que los buques libres, dan tambien libertad á las mercaderias, y que se ha de considerar libre y esento todo lo que se hallare á bordo de los buques pertenecientes á los ciudadanos de cualquiera de las partes contratantes, aunque toda la carga ó parte de ella pertenezca a enemigos de una ù otra, eceptuando siempre los articulos de contrabando de guerra. Se conviene tambien del mismo modo, en que la misma libertad se estienda á las personas que se encuentren á bordo de buques libres, con el fin de que aunque dichas personas sean enemigos de ambas partes ó de alguna de ellas, no deban ser estraidos de los buques libres, à menos que sean oficiales ó soldados en actual servicio de los enemigos: à condicion no obstante, y se conviene aqui en esto, que las estipulaciones contenidas en el presente articulo, declarando que el pabellon cubre la propiedad, se entenderàn aplicables solamente á aquellas potencias que reconocen este principio; pero si alguna de las dos partes contratantes, estuviere en guerra con una tercera, y la otra permaneciese neutrál, la bandera de la neutrál cubrirá la propriedad de los enemigos, cuyos Gobiernos reconozcan este principio y no de otras.

ARTICULO 15. Se conviene igualmente que en el caso de que la bandera neutrál de una de las partes contratantes protega las propiedades de los enemigos de la otra en virtud de lo estipulado arriba, deberá siempre entenderse, que las propiedades neutrales encontradas á bordo de tales buques enemigos, han de tenerse y considerarse como propiedades enemigas, y como tales estaràn sujetas á detencion, y confiscacion, eseptuando solamente aquellas propiedades que hubiesen sido puestas à bordo de tales buques antes de la declaracion de la guerra y aun despues, si hubiesen sido embarcadas en dichos buques, sin tenèr noticia de la guerra; y se conviene, que pasados dos meses despues de la declaracion, los ciudadanos de una y otra parte no podrán alegàr que la ignoraban. Por el contrario, si la bandera neutral, no protegiese las propiedades enemigas, entonces seràn libres los efectos y mercaderias de la parte neutràl, embarcadas en buques enemigos.

ARTICULO 16. Esta libertad de navigacion y comercio se estenderà a todo genero de mercaderias, eceptuando aquellas solamente, que se distinguen con el nombre de contrabando, y bajo este nombre de contrabando ó efectos prohibidos se comprenderán:

1. Canones, morteros, obuces, pedreros, trobucos, mosquetes, fusiles, rifles, carabinas, pistolas, picas, espadas, sables, lanzas, chuzos, alabardas, y grenadas, bombas, polvora, mechas, balas, con las demas cosas correspondientes al uso de estas armas.

2. Escudos, casquetes, corazas, cotas de mala, fornituras, y vestidos hechos en forma, y á forma, y á usanza militar.

3. Bandoleras, y caballos junto con sus armas y arneses.

4. Y generalmente todo especie de armas, é instrumentos de hierro, acero, bronce, cobre, y otras materias cualesquiera, manufacturadas, preparadas, y formadas espresamente para hacér la guerra por mar, ó tierra.

ARTICULO 17. Todas las demas mercaderias, y efectos no comprendidos en los articulos de contrabando esplicitamente enumerados, y clasificados en el articulo anterior, serán tenidos, y reputados por libres, y de licito y libre comercio, de modo, que ellos puedan sér transportados, y llevados de la manera mas libre, por los ciudadanos de ambas partes contratantes, aun á los lugares pertenecientes á un enemigo de una ù otra, eceptuando solamente aquellos lugares ó plazas, que estàn al mismo tiempo are besieged or blockaded which are actually attacked by a belligerent force capable of preventing the entry of the neutral.

ARTICLE 18. The articles of contraband before enumerated and classified, which may be found in a vessel bound for an enemy's port, shall be subject to detention and confiscation, leaving free the rest of the cargo and the ship, that the owners may dispose of them as they see proper. No vessel of either of the two nations shall be detained on the high seas on account of having on board articles of contraband, whenever the master, captain, or supercargo of said vessels will deliver up the articles of contraband to the captor, unless the quantity of such articles be so great and of so large a bulk that they cannot be received on board the capturing ship without great inconvenience; but in this and in all other cases of just detention the vessel detained shall be sent to the nearest convenient and safe port for trial and judgment according to law.

ARTICLE 19. And whereas it frequently happens that vessels sail for a port or place belonging to an enemy without knowing that the same is besieged, blockaded, or invested, it is agreed that every vessel so circumstanced may be turned away from such port or place, but shall not be detained, nor shall any part of her cargo, if not contraband, be confiscated, unless, after warning of such blockade or investment from the commanding officer of the blockading forces, she shall again attempt to enter; but she shall be permitted to go to any other port or place she shall think proper. Nor shall any vessel of either, that may have entered into such port before the same was actually besieged, blockaded, or invested by the other, be restrained from quitting such place with her cargo, nor, if found therein after the reduction and surrender, shall such vessel or her cargo be liable to confiscation, but they shall be restored to the owners thereof.

ARTICLE 20. In order to prevent all kind of disorder in the visiting and examination of the ships and cargoes of both the contracting parties on the high seas, they have agreed, mutually, that whenever a vessel-of-war, public or private, shall meet with a neutral of the other contracting party, the first shall remain out of cannon shot, and may send its boat, with two or three men only, in order to execute the said examination of the papers concerning the ownership and cargo of the vessel, without causing the least extortion, violence, or ill treatment, for which the commanders of the said armed ships shall be responsible with their persons and property; for which purpose the commanders of said private armed vessels shall, before receiving their commissions, give sufficient security to answer for all the damages they may commit. And it is expressly agreed that the neutral party shall in no case be required to go on board the examining vessel for the purpose of exhibiting her papers, or for any other purpose whatever.

ARTICLE 21. To avoid all kind of vexation and abuse in the examination of the papers relating to the ownership of the vessels belonging to the citizens of the two contracting parties, they have agreed, and do agree, that in case one of them should be engaged in war, the ships and vessels belonging to the citizens of the other must be furnished with sea letters or passports, expressing the name, property, and bulk of the ship, as also the name and place of habitation of the master or commander of said vessel, in order that it may thereby appear that the ship really and truly belongs to the citizens of one of the parties; they have likewise agreed that, such ships being laden, besides the said sea letters or passports, shall also be provided with certificates sitiadas ó bloqueadas; y para evitar toda duda en el particulàr, se declaran sitiadas ó bloqueadas àquellas plazas, que en la actualidad estuviesen atacadas por una fuerza de un beligerante capaz de impedir la entrada del neutral.

ARTICULO 18. Los articulos de contrabando antes enumerados y clasificados, que se hallen en un buque destinado à puerto enemigo estarán sujetos à detencion y confiscacion; dejando libre el resto del cargamento y el buque, para que los duenos puedan disponer de ellos como lo crean conveniente. Ningun buque de cualquiera de las dos naciones, será detenido, por tener à bordo articulos de contrabando, siempre que el maestre, capitan, ó sobrecargo, de dicho buque quiera entregàr los articulos de contrabando al apresador, à menos que la cantidad de estos articulos sea tan grande y de tanto volumen, que no puedan sér recibidos à bordo del buque apresadór, sin grandes inconvenientes; pero en este, como en todos los otros casos de justa detencion, el buque detenido serà enviado al puerto mas inmediato, comodo, y seguro, para ser juzgado y sentenciado conforme à las leyes.

ARTICULO 19. Y por cuanto frecuentemente sucede que los buques navegan para un puerto ó lugàr perteneciente à un enemigo, sin saber que aquel esté sitiado, bloqueado ó envestido, se conviene en que todo buque en estas circunstancias se pueda hacer volver de dicho puerto, ó lugar; pero no serà detenido, ni confiscada, parte alguna de su cargamento, no siendo contrabando; à menos des despues de la intimacion de semejante bloqueo ó ataque, por el comandante de las fuerzas bloqueadoras, intentase otra vez entrar; pero le serà permitido ir à cualquiera otro puerto ó lugar que jusgue conveniente. Ni ningun buque de una de las partes, que haya entrado en semejante puerto, ó lugar, antes que estuviese sitiado, bloqueado ó envestido por la otra, sera impedido de dejar el tal lugar con su cargamento ni si fuere hallado alli despues de la rendicion y entrega de semejante lugar, estrarà el tal buque ó su cargamento sujeto à confiscacion, sino que seràn restituidos á sus dueños.

ARTICULO 20. Para evitar todo genero de desorden en la visita, y examen de los buques y cargamentos de ambas partes contratantes en alta mar, han convenido mutuamente, que siempre que un buque de guerra, publico ó particular se encontrase con un neutral de la otra parte contrante, el primero permanecerà fuera de tiro de cañon, y podrà mandàr su bote, con dos ó tres hombres solamente, para ejecutàr el dicho examen de los papéles concernientes á la propiedad y carga del buque, sin ocasionàr la menor estorcion, violencia ó mal tratamiento, por lo que los comandantes del dicho buque armado seràn responsables, con sus personas y bienes; á cuyo efecto los comandantes de buques armados, por cuenta de particulares, estaràn obligados antes de entregarseles sus comisiones ó patentes, à dar fianza suficiente para respondér de los perjuicios que causen. Y se ha convenido espresamente, que en ningun caso se exigira à la parte neutral, que vaya à bordo del buque examinadór con el fin de exibir sus papeles, ó para cualquiera otro objeto sea el que fuere.

ARTICULO 21. Para evitar toda clase de vejamen y abuso en el examen de los papeles relativos à la propiedad de los buques pertenecientes à los ciudadanos de las dos partes contratantes, han convenido y convienen, que en caso de que una de ellas estuviere en guerra, los buques, y bajeles pertenecientes à los ciudadanos de la otra, seràn provistos con letras de màr, ó pasaportes, espresando el nombre, propiedad y tamaño del buque, como tambien el nombre y lugar de la residencia del maestre ó comandante, à fin de que se vea que el buque, real y verdaderamente pertenece à los ciudadanos de una de las partes; y han convenido igualmente, que estando cargados los espresados buques, ademas de las letras de mar, ó pasaportes, estaran tambien pro-containing the several particulars of the cargo, and the place whence the ship sailed, so that it may be known whether any forbidden or contraband goods be on board the same; which certificates shall be made out by the officers of the place whence the ship sailed in the accustomed form; without which requisites said vessel may be detained to be adjudged by the competent tribunal, and may be declared legal prize unless the said defects shall be satisfied or supplied by testimony entirely equivalent.

ARTICLE 22. It is further agreed that the stipulations above expressed, relative to the visiting and examination of vessels, shall apply only to those which sail without convoy; and when said vessels shall be under convoy, the verbal declaration of the commander of the convoy, on his word of honor, that the vessels under his protection belong to the nation whose flag he carries, and when they are bound to an enemy's port, that they have no contraband goods on board, shall be sufficient.

ARTICLE 23. It is further agreed that in all cases the established courts for prize causes, in the country to which the prizes may be conducted, shall alone take cognizance of them. And whenever such tribunal of either party shall pronounce judgment against any vessel, or goods, or property claimed by the citizens of the other party, the sentence or decree shall mention the reasons or motives on which the same shall have been founded, and an authenticated copy of the sentence or decree, and of all the proceedings in the case, shall, if demanded, be delivered to the commander or agent of said vessel without any delay, he paying the legal fees for the same.

ARTICLE 24. Whenever one of the contracting parties shall be engaged in war with another State, no citizen of the other contracting party shall accept a commission, or letter of marque, for the purpose of assisting or co-operating hostilely with the said enemy against the said party so at war, under the pain of being treated as a pirate.

ARTICLE 25. If by any fatality, which cannot be expected, and which God forbid, the two contracting parties should be engaged in a war with each other, they have agreed, and do agree, now for then, that there shall be allowed the term of six months to the merchants residing on the coasts and in the ports of each other, and the term of one year to those who dwell in the interior, to arrange their business, and transport their effects wherever they please, giving to them the safe conduct necessary for it, which may serve as a sufficient protection until they arrive at the designated port. The citizens of all other occupations, who may be established in the territories or dominions of the United States and of the Federation of the Centre of America, shall be respected and maintained in the full enjoyment of their personal liberty and property, unless their particular conduct shall cause them to forfeit this protection, which, in consideration of humanity, the contracting parties engage to give them.

ARTICLE 26. Neither the debts due from individuals of the one nation to the individuals of the other, nor shares, nor moneys, which they may have in public funds, or in public or private banks, shall ever, in any event of war, or of national difference, be sequestered or confiscated.

ARTICLE 27. Both the contracting parties, being desirous of avoiding all inequality in relation to their public communications and official intercourse, have agreed, and do agree, to grant to the envoys, ministers, and other public agents, the same favors, immunities, and exemptions, which those of the most favored nation do or shall enjoy; it being understood that whatever favors, immunities or privileges the United States of America or the Federation of the Centre of America may find it proper to give the vistos de certificatos, que contengan los por menores del cargamente, y el lugar de donde salió el buque, para que asi pueda saberse, si hay à su bordo algunos efectos prohibidos ó de contrabando, cuyos certificatos serán hechos por los oficiales del lugár de la procedencia del buque, en la forma acostumbrada, sin cuyos requisitos el dicho buque puede ser detenido, para ser juzgado por el tribunal competente, y puede ser declarado buena presa, à menos que satisfagan, ó suplan el defecto con testimonios enteramente equivalentes.

ARTICULO 22. Se ha convenido ademas, que las estipulaciones anteriores, relativas al examen y visita de buques, se aplicaràn solamente à los que navegan sin conboy y que cuando los dichos buques estuvieren bajo de conboy, será bastante la declaracion verbal del comandante del conboy, bajo su palabra de honór, de que los buques que estàn bajo su proteccion pertenecen a la nacion, cuya bandera llevan, y cuando se dirijen á un puerto enemigo, que los dichos buques no tienen á su bordo articulos de contrabando de guerra.

ARTICULO 23. Se ha convenido ademas, que en todos los casos que occurran, solo los tribunales establecidos para causas de presas, en el pais á que las presas sean conducidas, tomarán conocimiento de ellas. Y siempre que semejante tribunal de cualquiera de las partes, pronunciase sentencia contra algun buque, ó efectos, ó propiedad reclamada por los ciudadanos de la otra parte, la sentencia ó decreto harà mencion de las razones ó motivos en que aquella se haya fundado, y se entregará sin demora alguna al comandante ó agente de dicho buque, si lo solicitase, un testimonio autentico de la sentencia, ó decreto, ó de todo el proceso, pagando por el los derechos legales.

ARTICULO 24. Siempre que una de las partes contratantes estuviere empeñada en guerra, con otro Estado ningun ciudadano de la otra parte contratante aceptara una comision, ó letra de marca, para el objeto de ayudár ó co-operar hostilmente con el con el dicho enemigo, contra la dicha parte que este asi en guerra, bajo la pena de ser trata do como pirata.

ARTICULO 25. Si por alguna fatalidad, que no puede esperarse, y que Dios no permita, las dos partes contratantes se viesen empeñadas en guerra una con otra, han convenido y convienen de ahora para entonces, que se concederà el termino de seis meses á los comerciantes residentes en las costas y en los puertos de entrambas, y el termino de un año á los que habitan en el interior, para arreglár sus negocios, y transportár sus efectos á donde quieran, dandoles el salvo conducto necesario para ello, que les sirva de suficiente proteccion hasta que lleguen al puerto que designen. Los ciudadanos de otras ocupaciones, que se hallen establecidos en los territorios ó dominios de la Federacion de Centro-America, ó los Estados-Unidos de America, serán respetados, y mantenidos en el pleno goze de su libertad personal y propiedad, á menos que su conducta particular les haga perdér esta proteccion, que en consideracion á la humanidad, las partes contratantes se conprometen á prestarles.

ARTICULO 26. Ni las deudas contriadas por los individuos de una nacion, con los individuos de la otra, ni las acciones ó dineros, que pueden tenér en los fondos publicos, ó en los bancos publicos, ó privados, serán jamas secuestrados ó confiscados en ningun caso de guerra, ó diferencia nacional.

ARTICULO 27. Deseando ambas partes cantratantes, evitár toda diferencia, relativa á etiqueta en sus comunicaciones, y correspondencias diplomaticas han convenido asi mismo, y convienen en conceder á sus enviados, ministros, y otros agentes diplomaticos, los mismos favores, inmunidades, y esenciones da que gozan, ó gozaren en lo venidero los de las naciones mas favorecidas, bien entendido que cualquier favór, inmunidad ó privilegio, que la Federacion de Centro-America ó los Estados-Unidos ministers and public agents of any other Power, shall, by the same act, be extended to those of each of the contracting parties.

ARTICLE 28. To make more effectual the protection which the United States and the Federation of the Centre of America shall afford in future to the navigation and commerce of the citizens of each other, they agree to receive and admit Consuls and Vice Consuls in all the ports open to foreign commerce, who shall enjoy in them all the rights, prerogatives, and immunities of the Consuls and Vice Consuls of the most favored nation; each contracting party, however, remaining at liberty to except those ports and places in which the admission and residence of such Consuls may not seem convenient.

ARTICLE 29. In order that the Consuls and Vice Consuls of the two contracting parties may enjoy the rights, prerogatives, and immunities which belong to them by their public character, they shall, before entering on the exercise of their functions, exhibit their commission or patent, in due form, to the Government to which they are accredited; and having obtained their exequatur, they shall be held and considered as such by all the authorities, magistrates, and inhabitants in the consular district in which they reside.

ARTICLE 30. It is likewise agreed that the Consuls, their Secretaries, officers, and persons attached to the service of Consuls, they not being citizens of the country in which the Consul resides, shall be exempt from all public service, and also from all kind of taxes, imposts, and contributions, except those which they shall be obliged to pay on account of commerce or their property, to which the citizens and inhabitants, native and foreign, of the country in which they reside are subject, being in everything besides subject to the laws of the respective States. The archives and papers of the consulate shall be respected inviolably, and under no pretext whatever shall any magistrate seize, or in any way interfere with them.

ARTICLE 31. The said Consuls shall have power to require the assistance of the authorities of the country for the arrest, detention, and custody of deserters from the public and private vessels of their country; and for that purpose they shall address themselves to the courts, judges, and officers competent, and shall demand the said deserters in writing, proving, by an exhibition of the registers of the vessels or ship's roll, or other public documents, that those men were part of the said crews; and on this demand, so proved, (saving, however, where the contrary is proved,) the delivery shall not be refused. Such deserters, when arrested, shall be put at the disposal of the said Consuls, and may be put in the public prisons at the request and expense of those who reclaim them, to be sent to the ships to which they belonged, or to others of the same nation. But if they be not sent back within two months, to be counted from the day of their arrest, they shall be set at liberty, and shall be no more arrested for the same cause.

ARTICLE 32. For the purpose of more effectually protecting their commerce and navigation, the two contracting parties do hereby agree, as soon hereafter as circumstances will permit them, to form a consular convention, which shall declare specially the powers and immunities of the Consuls and Vice Consuls of the respective parties.

ARTICLE 33. The United States of America and the Federation of the Centre of America, desiring to make as durable as circmstances will permit the relations which are to be established between the two parties by virtue of this treaty, or general convention of peace, amity, commerce, and navigation, have declared solemnly and do agree to the following points:

de America, tengan por conveniente dispensár á los enviados, ministros, y agentes diplomaticos de otras Potencias, se haga por el mismo hecho extensivo á los de una y otra de las partes contratantes.

ARTICULO 28. Para hacér mas efectiva la proteccion, que la Federacion de Centro-America, y los Estados-Unidos de America, darán en adelante á la navegacion y comercio de los ciudadanos de una y otra, se convienen en recibir y admitir Consules y Vice Consules en todos los puertos abiertos al comercio estrangero, quienes gozarán en ellos todos los derechos, prerogativas é inmunidades de los Consules y Vice Consules de la nacion mas favorecida, quedando no obstante en libertad cada parte contratante, para eceptuar aquellos puertos y lugares en que la admision y residencia de semejantes Consules y Vice Consules no parezca conveniente.

ARTICULO 29. Para que los Consules y Vice Consules de las dos partes contratantes, puedan gozar los derechos, prerogativas, é inmunidades, que les corresponden por su caracter publico, antes de entrár en el ejercicio de sus funciones, presentarán su comision ó patente en la forma debida, al Gobierno conquien esten acreditados, y habiendo obtenido el exequatur, serán tenidos, y considerados como tales, por todas las autoridades, majistrados y habitantes del distrito consular en que residan.

ARTICULO 30. Se ha convenido igualmente, que los Consules, sus Secretarios, officiales y personas agregadas al servicio de los consulados (no siendo estas personas ciudadanos del pais en que el Consul reside) estaran esentos de todo servicio publico, y tambien de toda especie de pechos, impuestos, y contribuciones, eceptuando aquellas que esten obligados á pagar por razon de comercio, ó propiedad, y á las cuales estan sujetos los ciudadanos, y habitantes naturales, y estrangeros del pais en que residen, quedando en todo lo demas, sujetos a las leyes de los respectivos Estados. Los archivos y papeles de los consulados serán respetados inviolablemente, y bajo ningun pretest ó los occupará magistrado alguno, ni tendrá en ellos ninguna intervencion.

ARTICULO 31. Los dichos Consules tendrán poder de requerir el auxilio de las autoridades locales, para la prision, detencion y custodia de los desertores de buques publicos y particulares de su pais, y para este objeto se dirigiràn á los tribunales, jueces, y oficiales competentes, y pedirán los dichos desertores por escrito, probando por una presentacion de los registros de los buques, rol del equipage, ù otros documentos publicos, que aquellos hombres eran parte de las dichas tripulaciones, y á esta demanda asi probada (menos no obstante cuando se probare lo contrario) no se reusará la entrega. Semejantes desertores, luego que sean arrestados, se pondrán á disposicion de los dichos Consules, y pueden ser depositados en las prisiones publicas, á solicitud y espensas de los que los reclamen, para ser enviados á los buques á que corresponden ó á otros de la misma nacion. Pero si no fueren mandados dentro de dos meses contados des de el dia de su arresto, serán puestos en libertad, y no volverán a ser presos por la misma causa.

ARTICULO 32. Para protegér mas efectivamente su comercio y navegacion, las dos partes contratantes se convienen en formar luego que las circunstancias lo permitan, una convencion consulár, que declare mas especialmente los poderes é inmunidades de los Consules y Vice Consules de las partes respectivas.

ARTICULO 33. La Federacion de Centro-America y los Estados-Unidos de America, deseando hacer tan duraderas y firmes, como las circunstancias lo permitan las relaciones que han de establecerse entre las dos potencias, en virtud del presente convencion ó tratado general de paz, amistad, navegacion, y comercio, han declarado solemnemente y convienen en los puntos siguientes:

1. The present treaty shall remain in full force and virtue for the term of twelve years, to be counted from the day of the exchange of the ratifications, in all the parts relating to commerce and navigation; and in all those parts which relate to peace and friendship, it shall be permanently and perpetually binding on both powers.

2. If any one or more of the citizens of either party shall infringe any of the articles of this treaty, such citizen shall be held personally responsible for the same, and the harmony and good correspondence between the two nations shall not be interrupted thereby—each party engaging in no way to protect the offender or sanction such violation.

3. If, (which, indeed, cannot be expected,) unfortunately, any of the articles contained in the present treaty shall be violated or infringed in any other way whatever, it is expressly stipulated that neither of the contracting parties will order or authorize any acts of reprisal, nor declare war against the other, on complaints of injuries or damages, until the said party considering itself offended shall first have presented to the other a statement of such injuries or damages, verified by competent proof, and demanded justice and satisfaction, and the same shall have been either refused or unreasonably delayed.

4. Nothing in this treaty contained shall, however, be construed or operate contrary to former and existing public treaties with other sovereigns or States.

The present treaty of peace, amity, commerce, and navigation, shall be approved and ratified by the President of the United of America, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate thereof, and by the Government of the Federation of the Centre of America, and the ratifications shall be exchanged in the City of Guatemala, within eight months from the date of the signature hereof, or sooner if possible.

In faith whereof, we, the plenipotentiaries of the United States of America and of the Federation of the Centre of America, have signed and sealed these presents.

Done in the City of Washington, on the fifth day of December, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and twenty-five, in the fiftieth year of the Independence of the United States of America, and the fifth of that of the Federation of the Centre of America, in duplicate.

ANTONIO JOSÉ CANAS. [L. S.]

1. El presente tratado permanecerá en su fuerza y vigor por el termino de doce años contados desde el dia del cange de las ratificaciones, en todos los puntos, concernientes à comercio y navegacion, y en todos los demas puntos que se refieren á paz y amistad, será permanente, y perpetuamente obligatorio para ambas potencias.

2. Si alguno, ó algunos de los ciudadanos de una ù otra parte infringiesen alguno de los articulos contenidos en el presente tratado, dichos ciudadanos seran personalmente responsables, sin que por esto se interrumpa la harmonia y buena correspondencia entre las dos naciones, comprometiendose cáda una à no protegér de modo alguno al ofensor, ó sancionár semejante violacion.

3. Si (lo que á la verdad no puede esperase) desgraciadamente, alguno de los articulos contenidos en el presente tratado, fuesen en alguna otra manera violados, ó infringidos, se estipula espresamente que ninguna de las dos partes contratantes, ordenará, ó autorizará ningunos actos de represalia, ni declarará la guerra contra la otra por quejas de injurias, ó daños, hasta que la parte que se crea ofendida, haya antes presentado á la otra una esposicion de aquellas injurias, ó daños, verificada con pruebas y testimonios competentes, exigiendo justicia y satisfaccion, y esto haya sido negado, ó diferido sin razon.

4. Nada de cuanto se contiene en el presente tratado, se construirá sin embargo, ni obrará, en contra de otros tratados publicos anteriores, y existentes con otros soberanos ó Estados.

El presente tratado de paz, amistad, comercio, y navegacion, será ratificado por el Gobierno de la Federacion de Centro-America, por el Presidente de los Estados-Unidos de America, con consejo y consentimiento del Senado de los mismos; y las ratificaciones serán cangeadas en la Ciudad de Guatemala dentro de ocho meses contados desde este dia, ó antes si fuese posible.

En fe de lo cual nosotros los plenipotenciarios de la Federacion de Centro-America y de los Estados-Unidos de America, hemos firmado y sellado las presentes.

Dadas en la Ciudad de Washington, el dia cinco de Deciembre del año del Señor mil ocho cientos veinticinco quinto de la Independencia de la Federacion de Centro-America y quinquagesimo de la de los Estados-Unidos de America, per duplicado.

H. CLAY. [L. S.]

And whereas the said convention has been duly ratified on both parts, and the respective ratifications of the same were exchanged, at Guatemala, on the second day of August, one thousand eight hundred and twenty-six, by John Williams, Chargé d'Affaires of the United States near the Government of the Federation of the Centre of America, and Pedro Gonzalez, Chief Officer of the Department of State, Despatch, War, and Marine, Secretary of Legation of the Republic of Central America near the Governments of South America, on the part of their respective Governments:

Now, therefore, be it known that I, John Quincy Adams, President of the United States, have caused the said convention to be made public, to the end that the same, and every clause and article thereof, may be observed and fulfilled with good faith by the United States and the citizens thereof.

In witness whereof, I have hereunto set my hand and caused the seal of the United States to be affixed.

AFFAIRS WITH BRAZIL.

COPIES AND EXTRACTS FROM THE CORRESPONDENCE OF CAPTAIN JESSE D. ELLIOTT, COMMUNICATED WITH THE PRECEDING MESSAGE OF DECEMBER 5, 1826.

Captain J. D. Elliott to the Secretary of the Navy.

UNITED STATES SHIP CYANE, Rio de Janeiro, March 18, 1826.

"On the 15th instant I had the honor to address you, and now to say that I am supplied with provisions and water; that in the morning I shall depart hence for the La Plata.

"By the same vessel which conveys this letter the State Department will be apprised of the protest entered by both of our representatives at the Courts of Buenos Ayres and of Brazil against the legality of the blockade proclaimed of the whole extent of the coast of Buenos Ayres, and of that of the Banda Oriental, by Admiral Lobo, of the navy of his Imperial Majesty the Emperor of Brazil.

"Here I am called upon to adopt a course, in relation to this proclamation, entirely new and novel, but which I hope, in the end, will prove satisfactory to the Government and the nation. The present force employed in the blockade is extended to nearly thirty vessels, and an additional one of three frigates is now preparing to relieve and to reinforce that already at the La Plata. A schooner has just entered this port from Montevideo, and brings the information that, in order to enforce more fully the blockade, all vessels warned off are obliged to enter into bonds at Montevideo, to an amount equal to the value of both vessel and cargo, that they will not repeat the attempt to re-enter the river. It is here said the English vessels-of-war resist this measure, and that the English Consul at Montevideo has protested in toto against the blockade; but how far this is correct I am not prepared to say. I have had a full and free intercourse with Mr. Raguet, as you will perceive by the correspondence enclosed. With the laws of nations before me, and with the constant and steady grounds taken and maintained by the various administrations of our Government in relation to this subject, I shall deport towards the squadron as becomes both the interests of the Navy of the nation and of its commerce."

Extract of a letter from Woodbridge Odlin, Esq., to J. D. Elliott, Esq., Commander of the United States Ship Cyane, dated St. Salvador, March 4, 1826.

"The slave trade appears to be carried on with little interruption by the Brazilians; and a large portion of said negroes are, as I understand, taken in to the north of the line. I have never been able to ascertain that any citizens of the United States have, directly or indirectly, any interest whatever in said slave trade. I am well acquainted with the concerns of those Americans who live here, and do not believe they have any interest in said trade.

"The greater part of the vessels employed in said slave trade at and from this port are built in the United States, are regularly sold here, and the crews discharged, and, to the best of my knowledge, return to the United States. Some few, who frequently desert, I cannot tell where they proceed, as they do not often call on me. It is common for American vessels to take freight and proceed to Africa from this port, and commonly return in ballast. At present I do not think of any other information to make known; should I obtain any, I will, with pleasure, give you notice of it."

UNITED STATES SHIP CYANE, Rio de Janeiro, March 14, 1826.

SIR: The Government of the United States has assigned to me a cruise on the coast of Brazil, for the double purpose of giving protection to our commerce, as also to have intercourse with our public agents on shore. Destined further south, the stay I shall make in port will be only sufficiently long to enable me to replenish my stock of provisions. Should you have any communications to make touching the first two points, I shall be glad to receive them. At the period of my departure from the United States our Government was not then possessed of information as to the blockade of the Rio de la Plata, and perhaps it is important I should have information from you on four points: first, as to the legality of the blockade; second, as to the force, both naval and military, employed in carrying it into effect; third, whether designed to exclude from the river both the civil and military marine of each of the various nations; fourth, whether each point is presented with such force, by both sea and land, as will enforce its declaration.

With great respect, I have the honor to be, your obedient servant,

J. D. ELLIOTT.

CONDY RAGUET, Esq., in Charge of the Affairs of the United States at the Capital of Brazil.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, Rio de Janeiro, March 18, 1826.

SIR: I had the honor to receive, on the day subsequent to its date, your communication of the 14th instant, and, in reply thereto, submit the following observations:

The presence of one or more of the public ships of the United States on this coast during the continuance of the war now existing between the Empire of Brazil and the Republic of the United Provinces of the River Plate cannot fail, for reasons well known to you, to be highly beneficial to the commerce of our citizens. Even long before the existence of hostilities the want of such protection as could only be afforded by a naval force was in some degree felt; but our Government, aware of the existence, in some parts of this country, of a disposition to oppose the present order of things, and desirous to avoid all imputations of intermeddling in the concerns of another State, very wisely and discreetly abstained from the employment of any portion of its marine in this quarter. I need hardly state to you that, had our Government resolved to station on this coast even a single ship during the time when an attempt was making to establish a Republic in the northern provinces, it would have been difficult to persuade a suspicious people that we were not instrumental in promoting revolutionary schemes. The President, no doubt, foresaw this, and it was the determination of our Government to act, in regard to the Brazilian question, with the same fairness and neutrality which have invariably marked our political conduct in regard to other States. A course has been pursued which cannot fail to entitle us to the character of a just and consistent nation. The independence and tranquillity of Brazil having, however, placed her on a footing with other established nations, all occasion for extreme delicacy, on our part, is at an end; and I cannot but hope that our Government will see the advantage of maintaining in this sea a respectable force upon a permanent establishment. The very presence of a public ship always commands respect for the nation to which she belongs, and that respect acts as a check upon aggressions which might otherwise be attempted. This, I have no doubt, will be fully proved by your visit to the river Plate; and should it happen that your active interference be not required for the protection of American citizens and property, I am well persuaded that this will be the result of that passive influence which silently operates and prevents the commission of outrages.

In relation to your inquiries respecting the blockade of the river Plate, I answer as follows:

On the 6th and 7th days of December last, notice was given by this Government to the diplomatic and consular agents here residing that the ports of the United Provinces of the River of Plate would be blockaded. In consequence of this notice, I thought it proper to address a note to the Minister of Foreign Affairs explanatory of the views entertained by the Government of the United States, as far as I was acquainted with them, in relation to the laws of blockade, with the object of avoiding, at the commencement, all misunderstanding to which a different construction might give rise. Of this note, which was dated on the 13th December, I take the liberty of handing you a copy; and I also enclose to you a copy of the answer received from the minister, under date of the 22d of same month.

As to the legality of the blockade, in regard to its enforcement, we have, at this distance, no means of judging. You will, however, have observed, by the protest made on the 13th of February by Mr. Forbes, our minister at Buenos Ayres, a copy of which I furnished you yesterday, against the blockade, as being altogether inefficient, that, in his opinion, it was clearly illegal at that period. Whether or no it has since been renewed by an adequate force you can best ascertain on your arrival in the river. But I would respectfully call your attention to one point, which you will find asserted in my note to the minister, and which I consider to be a very important one in the actual state of affairs, that "if any withdrawal of the blockading force should at any time take place, owing to the power of the besieged or his allies, or to the necessity of refitting or procuring supplies, or for the purpose of cruising or blockading other places, or from any other cause, (except storms, which drive it temporarily from its position, but which it immediately resumes,) the blockade was considered at an end; and a repetition of it could only be considered as a new blockade, and not as an uninterrupted continuation of the original one, which could affect the interest of neutrals who had entered the port in the meanwhile, when no blockading force was present to warn them off, or to obstruct their entry." From late advices it does appear that the blockading force has been once or twice entirely withdrawn; and it is, therefore, very clear that all seizures or detentions, on their leaving port, of neutral vessels which had entered when there was no blockade in existence must be illegal. We have no positive information, but it is supposed that the Brazilian squadron in the river, at the time of the declaration of the blockade, consisted of about forty-five sail, including gun-boats. As Buenos Ayres is not besieged by land, no military force is employed against it.

As to the question whether the blockade is designed to exclude public ships as well as merchant vessels of neutral nations, I reply that no communication has been made to me upon that subject by this Government; and although I have heard it said that the Minister of Foreign Affairs, in December last, stated, in conversation with some of my colleagues in public employment, that it was the intention of this Government to prohibit the entry into Buenos Ayres of foreign ships-of-war, yet the recent fact of the British corvette Chasseur having visited that port in the latter end of February is conclusive as to the non-existence at this day of any such design. Had any serious intention existed at any time on the part of the Brazilian ministry to attempt a measure so clearly at variance with the established laws of nations, official notice would undoubtedly have been given, and in that case I should not have failed to resist the doctrine as wholly inadmissible by the United States, and at the same time to have given notice that any attempt to impede the entry into a blockaded port of an American ship-of-war would be resisted by force.

The foregoing remarks appear to me to be such as are called for by your letter, and are respectfully submitted to your better judgment. I will merely add that the proclamation of Admiral Lobo, announcing the blockade, was dated on December 20, but it did not reach Buenos Ayres until the 31st. The declaration of war issued here was dated on the 10th of same month, but not made public until the 16th. No advices either of the blockade or war left this for the United States until the 26th of December.

Wishing you a pleasant and expeditious passage, and begging you to write to me whenever convenience and opportunity combine, I remain, with much esteem and respect, your friend and servant,

CONDY RAGUET.

J. D. ELLIOTT, Esq., Commanding United States Ship Cyane.

Mr. Raguet to the Minister of Foreign Affairs.

[BLOCKADE QUESTION.]

The undersigned, Chargé d'Affaires of the United States of America, presents his compliments to the Viscount of St. Amaro, Counsellor, Minister, and Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, and acknowledges the receipt, on the days of their respective dates, of his excellency's communications of 6th and 7th instant, the first announcing that "his Majesty the Emperor had ordered to be fitted out a naval force with the object of placing in effective blockade all the ports belonging to the Government of the United Provinces of the River of Plate," and the second, giving notice "that the said ports were to be blockaded by order of his Majesty the Emperor by the forces already there stationed, reinforced by those which have just departed."

As this measure of war cannot fail deeply to affect the interests of neutral nations, the merchants of which, with their own ships and capitals, carry on almost exclusively the foreign trade with Buenos Ayres and the other ports intended to be blockaded, and as the general terms of the notification involve a question of infinite importance to the interests of the United States, and all the other Powers of America, as well as the secondary States of Europe, the undersigned, as representing one of the nations most interested, conceives it to be his duty to bring to the view of his Majesty's Government some observations upon the principles of blockade, as maintained by the United States in their construction of national law, in the hopes that they may be found to be in accordance with those professed by his Majesty's Government, and that thus all liability to any misunderstanding which might possibly arise from the misapplication of those principles may be removed at the outset. The necessity of making this representation is rendered the more imperious on the undersigned by the occurrence of a case wherein a valuable American ship, seized by one of the commanders of his Majesty's naval service for an alleged breach of the blockade of Pernambuco, in September, 1824, remains to this day, after a lapse of near fifteen months, not only without a decision in the first instance, but even without an early prospect of one. As this matter, however, will form the subject of a separate communication, no further remarks in relation to it will here be made.

It cannot but be known to his excellency that the doctrine of blockades, as maintained in the practice of modern times by some of the European Powers, has been entirely subversive of the principles respected by the majority of nations, and which have been held to be settled by the most distinguished writers on public law, and even by those very Powers themselves in theory. The right of a belligerent to distress his enemy by the institution of sieges and blockades cannot be questioned; but the extent to which he may lawfully prejudice the interests of neutrals is a matter which it is not competent for the belligerent alone to decide. Neutrals as well as belligerents have their rights; and if the former have acceded to the rule that trade in articles of contraband of war may not be carried on with a country of a belligerent, this acquiescence is to be viewed as the result of that respect for the laws of humanity which desires to see a speedy termination to the disasters of war wherever they have unhappily been displayed. To this same respect for the laws of humanity is to be ascribed that further concession in favor of belligerents, by which neutral nations agree not to convey provisions or other supplies to ports or places actually besieged or blockaded, and upon no other principle can the abandonment, by neutral nations, of their innocent commerce with States with which they are in amity be contended for.

Neutral nations, however, in thus giving up for the common good a portion of their natural rights, by no means intended that an assailing belligerent should be invested with an artificial power to distress his antagonist, or with any advantages not due to the positive force of his arms. It was for this reason that the maxim was settled that no port could be considered as in a state of blockade unless so guarded as that "no vessel could enter without evident danger on account of vessels-of-war so stationed there as to form an effectual blockade." From this principle it followed that if any withdrawal of the blockading force should at any time take place, owing to the power of the besieged or his allies, or to the necessity of refitting or procuring supplies, or for the purpose of cruising, or blockading other places, or from any other cause, (except storms, which drive it temporarily from its position, but which it immediately resumes,) the blockade was considered at an end, and a repetition of it could only be considered as a new blockade, and not as an interrupted continuation of the original one, which could affect the interests of neutrals who had entered the port in the meanwhile when no blockading force was present to warn them off or obstruct their entry. In accordance with this equitable construction of the laws of blockade, as defined above, by the armed neutrality of 1780, the Government of Great Britain, the most powerful maritime nation of the world, in a convention with the Empire of Russia, formed in the year 1801, stipulated "that, in order to determine what characterizes a blockaded port, that denomination is only given to a port where there is, by the disposition of the Power that attacks it with ships stationary or sufficiently near, an evident danger in entering." It is needless to say that the other Powers of Europe as well as the United States, at that time the only independent American Power, never having disputed the principle, it could be otherwise regarded than as the established law of nations at the commencement of the present century, and it is equally clear that it must be so considered at this day, nothwithstanding the violations that have been practiced by States which acknowledged its correctness.

The principle, then, being indisputable that the existence on the spot of the means adequate to the end was necessary for the institution of a blockade, the next question that presented itself was, how were neutrals to be notified of the fact. That all aggressions upon an innocent and friendly stranger were contrary to the laws of humanity and justice was too palpable to be denied, and the very proper practice was soon introduced of warning neutrals about to enter a blockaded port of the existence of a blockade; and without this warning by the blockading force they could not be considered as liable to capture and confiscation. This just and equitable rule, not at all shaken by the refinements of modern sophistry or the outrages of modern injustice, was grounded upon a fair demarkation of the limits between the rights of neutrals and the rights of belligerents, and is supported by the following reasoning:

The right to prevent the entry of neutrals into the blockaded port of a Power with which they are in amity is, as above declared, the result of a concession in favor of the belligerent; but a concession only made for such length of time as the blockading party actually maintains the blockade. To prevent the entry of a neutral, even for a moment after the raising of the blockade, would be a manifest infringement of his rights; and if the doctrine were admitted that a notice published in a distant country of a blockade, which might by possibility be raised long before any vessel could reach the designated port, was the only one requisite, the consequences would be highly injurious to the interests of a distant nation, whose merchants would be deprived of the advantages, enjoyed by those near at hand, of furnishing supplies to the party which had been, by the recurrence of peace or other causes, relieved from the distresses of a siege. In countries which are proximate to each other, as Great Britain, France, Holland, &c., where the intercourse requires but the lapse of a few hours or days, the institution or withdrawal of a blockade may be known in so short a period of time as to render the importance of the principle here advocated less manifest than it is to nations which are relatively more distant, such as those that are separated by the Atlantic Ocean, and especially those that are located in different hemispheres. To meet this argument by contending that a vessel is bound to call for information at a neighboring port would be only substituting one measure of injustice for another. Leaving out of the question the impracticability in many cases, especially those wherein whole coasts are blockaded, of complying with such a demand, no belligerent has a right to compel a neutral vessel to perform a circuitous route to the port of her destination; nor has he the right to impose upon her the necessity of incurring the expense of port and other charges in his own ports or those of any other nation. So satisfied with the correctness of this principle was the Government of Great Britain that, in the year 1804, in consequence of a remonstrance made by the American Government against a declaration of a general blockade of "the islands of Martinique and Guadaloupe," proclaimed by the British naval commander, orders were issued to him "not to consider any blockade of those islands existing, unless in respect to particular ports which may be actually invested, and then not to capture vessels bound to such ports unless they shall previously have been warned not to enter there."

The United States, maintaining these same principles, have always denied the doctrine of general and diplomatic notifications of blockades as binding upon their citizens. Whenever they are made, however, they regard them as friendly offices on the part of the Government from which they proceed, because it gives their merchants an opportunity of taking into the calculations of their voyages the contingency of a continued effective blockade of the ports designated, and affords them occasion for advancing their own particular views upon that branch of the public code which has been so frequently violated by some of the principal Powers of Europe. In the year 1816 the Government of the United States, having been notified by the Spanish minister at Washington of a declaration of the blockade of the "ports of the Vice Royalty of Santa Fé," lost no time in protesting against the general terms of the same, and its representative at Madrid was instructed to advise the Government of Spain that a "blockade, to be acknowledged by the United States as valid, must be confined to particular ports, each having a force stationed before it sufficient to intercept the entry of vessels, and no vessel shall be seized even in attempting to enter a port so blockaded till she has been previously warned away from that port." It was also notified that indemnity would be claimed for all captures of American vessels not made in accordance with this rule.

It is manifestly not the interest of the new independent American States to adopt in their practice the broadest possible construction of the laws of blockade; for the time may come when, being at war with the powerful maritime nations of Europe, they may find it all important to be able to show that, like the United States, they have always adhered to these maxims which have been received and acknowledged as settled principles of national law, and have always been ready to observe those rules which, consistenly with self-protection, have operated least injuriously to neutral and friendly nations.

It is for this reason that the undersigned begs leave to invite the attention of his excellency to the following considerations connected with the important question referred to.

The submission of neutrals to the laws of blockade, as above established, is a concession granted to the besieger, and can only be construed to extend so far as shall promote his benefit. Any act, therefore, which can be shown to inflict a positive injury upon a neutral, without conferring a benefit on the besieger in the furtherance of his plans, must be inadmissible upon the common principles of national justice. Thus, if a neutral's vessels and property are within a port at the time of the institution of a blockade, it would be manifestly unjust to prohibit their departure, inasmuch as by so doing extensive evils would be brought upon the citizens of friendly nations in their pursuit of a lawful commerce. It is, indeed, difficult to imagine what justifiable motive could influence a besieger to prevent a neutral from withdrawing from the besieged place his ship and property; for, by such act, the means of escape and of defence, as well as the means of prolonging the contest, would be at the same time withdrawn from the enemy.

With respect to the right of neutral ships to depart, there seems to be no difference of opinion among nations, but the same does not happen in regard to their cargoes. In the year 1813, while Great Britain was at war with the United States, some of the European Powers remonstrated against the unjustifiable pretensions of her system of blockade, which embraced a chief part of the coast of the United States; and, in an answer given to the minister of Sweden, it was contended that although neutral vessels which had entered the American ports without a knowledge of the blockade might, in conformity with the established rule, be allowed to depart, yet that this permission could not be extended to their cargoes. Special motives in this particular case, on the part of Great Britain, might amply account for a measure which she might not perhaps willingly have approved if adopted by any other Power; and it is not to be wondered at that a nation which already monopolized so great a share of the commerce of the world should have pursued a system calculated to exclude from competition the capitals of other States.

If, therefore, it can be made to appear, to the satisfaction of his Majesty's Government, that the citizens of nations with which his Majesty is in amity are the proprietors of a large amount of property already in the ports of the United Provinces of the River Plate, or which may enter them before the institution of the blockades, the undersigned would respectfully submit to the consideration of his Majesty's Government whether it would not be advisable to furnish the officers who are to direct the same (in case the measure has not been already adopted) with explicit instructions on the subject, in order that by no misconception of Powers may neutrals be exposed to the privation of their property either by detention in port or by seizure after leaving it.

The undersigned trusts that in this communication his excellency will perceive an additional evidence of the desire by which he is actuated, of endeavoring to perpetuate the harmony and good understanding which so happily subsists between their respective nations, and which will be more and more strengthened in proportion as they mutually embrace the same principles of justice and of respect for each other's rights.

The undersigned, on this occasion, renews to his excellency the Viscount of St. Amaro the assurance of his great respect and esteem, and of the high consideration with which he has the honor to subscribe himself his excellency's most obedient and humble servant,

CONDY RAGUET.

Rio Janeiro, December 13, 1825.

[Translation.]

The undersigned, Counsellor, Minister, and Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, acknowledges the receipt of the note directed to him by Mr. Condy Raguet, Chargé d'Affaires of the United States of America, and has to inform him that the Government of his Imperial Majesty, penetrated with the sentiments of justice and impartiality expressed in his note, which accords with the liberal policy practiced by this Government, who never desire to adopt measures by which the subjects of other nations should suffer inconveniences which they would be unwilling their own should suffer in similar cases, has ordered the undersigned, in answer to your said note, to assure you that in the orders despatched to the commandant of the squadron blockading the ports of the United Provinces of the River of Plate, are expressly considered the vessels of neutral and friendly Powers which might have been there prior to the blockade, and determined that the said commandant should declare, by proclamation, [manifesto] that all the above mentioned vessels might freely depart with their cargoes within the term of fourteen days, and that the departure of vessels without cargoes (in ballast) should not be impeded at any time.

By those orders the Government have endeavored to prevent the occurrence of just motives of dispute or controversy between the said Government and that of neutral nations, in consequence of the actual war and of the said blockade; and the undersigned flatters himself that Mr. Condy Raguet will perceive in this answer the justice and frankness of the proceedings of this Government.

The undersigned has, by these motives, another occasion of expressing to Mr. Condy Raguet the sentiments of friendship and esteem which he renews.

VISCONDE DE S. ANDRE.

PALACE OF RIO JANEIRO, December 23, 1825.

The following important documents have been submitted to us for publication from the Department of Foreign Relations:

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, Buenos Ayres, February 13, 1826.

The undersigned, Chargé d'Affaires of the United States of America, having communications of high international interest to make to Admiral Lobo, commanding the Brazilian blockading squadron, most respectfully begs his excellency General de la Cruz, Minister of Foreign Relations, to grant him a flag of truce, according to the usages of war, to guaranty the safety of such an intercourse.

In order to manifest to this Government that sincere confidence which ought to exist between sister Republics, the undersigned has the honor to communicate a copy of the note which he wishes to transmit to the Brazilian Admiral. This note has for its object an humble effort to vindicate neutral rights in the principles and rules which ought to be observed in cases of blockade; and it is to be hoped that this attempt will not be misconstrued into any the slightest deviation from the straight line of most scrupulous and delicate neutrality between the belligerent parties, which it is the policy of the United States to observe under present circumstances.

The undersigned prays his excellency General de la Cruz, Minister of Foreign Relations, to accept the assurances of his highest consideration and respect.

JOHN M. FORBES.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, Buenos Ayres, February 13, 1826.

In the official note which the undersigned, Chargé d'Affaries of the United States of America had the honor to address to his excellency Admiral Lobo, commander of the imperial Brazilian squadron blockading the coasts and ports of Buenos Ayres, under date of 1st of January last, it was reserved by the undersigned to present on a future occasion the views and principles professed and put forth by the Government of the United States on the law of blockade. In conformity to that reservation, the undersigned now takes the liberty to present to the consideration of his excellency Admiral Lobo, and, if deemed worthy of transmission, to that of his Imperial Majesty's ministry, the following observations:

If the subject of blockade, so simple in its original application, now involves the most complicated questions of maritime law among nations, it is to be ascribed to abuses of power on one side, to too much condescension on the other, and to the multitude of incidental cases which have arisen as precedents, establishing arbitrary and ephemeral doctrines, since the breaking down of the original bounds and landmarks of mutual and universal rights.

Although the commerce of the United States has been, to a greater extent than any other, the victim of those gigantic abuses of power, it has never suffered without just complaints, in individual cases, and constant and strong remonstrances on the part of the Government of said States, against the principle and practice of everything like an imaginary blockade, the Hydra of lawless oppression.

Thus it has ever been maintained by the United States that a proclamation, or ideal blockade of an extensive coast, not supported by the actual presence of a naval power competent to enforce its simultaneous, constant and effective operation on every point of such coast, is illegal throughout its whole extent, even for the ports which may be in actual blockade; otherwise, every capture under a notified blockade would be legal, because the capture itself would be proof of the blockading force. This is, in general terms, one of the fundamental rules of the law of blockade as professed and practiced by the Government of the United States. And if this principle is to derive strength from the enormity of consequences resulting from a contrary practice, it could not be better sustained than by the terms of the original declaration of the existing Brazilian blockade, combined with its subsequent practical application.

The manifesto of his excellency Admiral Lobo, dated 21st of December last, declares that "all the ports and coasts of the Republic of Buenos Ayres, and all those on the Oriental side, (of La Plata,) which may be occupied by the troops of Buenos Ayres, are, from that date, subject to the most rigorous blockade." This declaration of blockade embraces an extent of maritime coast of more than twenty degrees of latitude; on which vast coast it is not pretended that his Imperial Majesty maintains any force beyond a single corvette, the "Maria da Gloria." If, therefore, there can exist anything like an imaginary blockade, this is, most unequivocally, one of that description; and, as such, in conformity with the principles before laid down, it calls for the resistance of the Government of the United States. If we turn our attention to the manner in which the blockade has been enforced in the immediate waters of Buenos Ayres, abundant matter of criticism presents itself. Since the establishment of the blockade, six foreign vessels, according to the annexed list, have entered the inner roads of Buenos Ayres, and three have gone into the port of Ensenada. Among the former, one was carried into Montevideo, detained nearly a week, and then suffered to take a new destination, without any endorsement of the notice of blockade on the principal papers of the vessel, as is practiced in similar cases by other maritime nations. Another, the Hamburg ship "Daphne," passed within gun shot of the Brazilian squadron, and, under the protection of a very inferior force, proceeded up to the anchorage in the inner roads. By these examples, occurring in a fine season of the year, there being no violent stormy weather to justify such a failure to enforce the blockade, it seems to be conclusively proved, either that the Brazilian squadron cannot, or that it will not, enforce it. And thus this high and important belligerent measure, which ought to be rigorously, constantly, and uniformly put into execution, has dwindled into a feeble and inefficient effort, depending on casualty, caprice, or convenience.

On a full view and mature consideration of all these circumstances, the undersigned feels it his indispensable duty to remonstrate and protest, and he thus remonstrates and protests against the blockade of the ports and coasts of the Republic of Buenos Ayres, as lately declared by his excellency Admiral Lobo, commander-in-chief of his Imperial Brazilian Majesty's forces; the said blockade being, in its general character, as well as in its practical application, stamped with inefficiency; supported by a naval power wholly incompetent to enforce it in its whole extent, and consequently illegal; prostrating neutral rights, and wholly inadmissible on the part of the Government of the United States.

Having thus remonstrated and protested against the said blockade, the undersigned reserves to the Government of the United States the right of continuing, as may be deemed expedient, the further discussion of national and individual interests involved in this very important subject.

The undersigned takes this occasion to renew to his excellency Admiral Lobo the assurances of his highest consideration and respect.

JOHN M. FORBES.

February 9, 1826. English brig Intrepid Packet.

United States Ship Cyane, Rio de Janeiro, April 21, 1826.

Sir: Herewith I have the honor to enclose you copies of letters, et cetera, which I have felt myself called upon to conduct with his excellency Don Rodrigo José Ferreira Lobo, commanding his Imperial Majesty the Emperor of Brazil's naval forces employed in enforcing a blockade of the ports in and about the Rio de la Plata; this has eventuated in the withdrawal, on the part of his excellency, of the previously proclaimed blockade of all that section of coast without the immediate confines of the La Plata; this, in the absence of force, and with a threat of the use of the little I had, was the best I could obtain. You will perceive I have not admitted the legality of the blockade to the extent it at present exists. Other particulars, in connexion with abuses committed on our trading vessels previous to my arrival at the La Plata, are also submitted to your inspection and use.

With great respect, I have the honor to be your obedient servant,

J. D. ELLIOTT.

Condy Raguet, Esq., in charge of the affairs of the United States at Rio de Janeiro.

UNITED STATES SHIP CYANE, off Montevideo, May 5, 1826.

SIR: On the 18th of March I had the honor to apprise you of my departure from Rio Janeiro, and I have now to say that on the 1st of April I arrived near Montevideo. After a detention there of two days by head winds, on the evening of the second I got under way for Buenos Ayres, and on the following morning I discovered a squadron of nearly thirty vessels at anchor off Cape Antonio, a part of which soon got under way and stood for the Cyane. I immediately altered my course for the purpose of nearing them, when, at the moment stated in the log-book, (an extract of which is herewith enclosed, marked A,) I was spoken by a frigate having a corvette and three brigs in company; was ordered to send my boat on board, which demand was peremptorily refused, but, at the same time, remarked that a boat would be received, and which was soon after sent alongside. On ascertaining the name of the ship, I was informed that the port of Buenos Ayres was in blockade, and that I could not be permitted to proceed; to which I replied that even if I were to admit their right to proclaim a blockade of an extent of coast against a civil marine, that both English and French vessels-of-war were in the habit of proceeding, since the proclamation of it, almost daily to and from Montevideo and Buenos Ayres, as instanced both in the British and French corvettes Chasseur and Fawn; that I would allow him thirty minutes to deliberate on his future action, and at the expiration of that time I should proceed, prepared to resist all consequences; that the flag I wore carried under it the sovereignty of the soil it represented; that violated, the soil became invaded, and I should defend the ship to the last moment; that I had a communication for Admiral Lobo, which he asked for, and which I declined presenting until he should have returned from the frigate and discovered to me his true character. At the expiration of the time named, I hailed, and asked if he desired any further intercourse; to which he replied that he would be glad to receive the letter for Admiral Lobo, when I remarked that it would be received by sending his boat alongside, which he soon did, with a polite message in the offer of anything he had on board for myself or the ship, and wished me a pleasant passage. On presenting the enclosed, marked B, I replied that I should return in a few days, and desired him to say so to the Admiral; that individually, as well as the ship, we were abundantly supplied, and wished nothing hereafter but a free, a liberal, and polite intercourse. I immediately made sail, passed round his bow and down the line, under all the canvas of the ship. On the 5th of April I reached the outer roads of Buenos Ayres, despatched an officer on shore with the accompanying communication, marked C, together with a message to Admiral Brown of their Navy, exchanged salutes with the military authority, as also with the Admiral, and on the morning following paid my respects to the President of Buenos Ayres, and to the other Government authorities, which were kindly received and returned.

Here I discovered many Americans in distress; received such of them on board as wished to come guests to myself and officers, and on the 18th I got under way and proceeded for the squadron of Admiral Lobo, whom I met on the 20th, exchanged honors with him, and received the accompanying communication, marked D. On the following evening I arrived at Montevideo, and exchanged salutes with the authority on shore. After obtaining a true translation of Admiral Lobo's letter of the 6th, (a copy of which is enclosed, marked E,) I replied to it by communication marked F.

Observing, previous to my departure from Buenos Ayres, in a New York paper, brought by a brig which had eluded the blockading force, that Lieutenant Cooper, in the Porpoise, had departed that port for the coast of Brazil, presuming he had instructions for me definitely on the subject of the blockade, I deferred acting, as previously intended, until I could receive them. I therefore left the subject open, taking with me to Rio de Janeiro, in the absence of force, the best conditions and terms I could obtain, produced by a friendly call I made Admiral Lobo, (who had just arrived from his anchorage with his squadron, several of them dismasted in a gale, which was severe, and lasted forty-eight hours,) stating to him that the object of my visit was entirely intended to exchange our ideas on the subject of the blockade, and the effects to be produced on our commerce. He remarked it was not a measure of his, but of his Imperial Majesty the Emperor of Brazil; that he agreed with me as to the illegality of the measure, and, at my suggestion, would so far alter his previous proclamation as to confine it to the Rio de la Plata, leaving open all outside, and that no vessel should be captured, on first presenting, in the river. When warned off, she had a right to enter any port outside. This condition was preceded by a remark from me that I should take all the American vessels at Montevideo in convoy, and protect them to any port where the conditions we required (to constitute a regular blockade) were not complied with. On the 25th and 27th of April I addressed him two notes, enclosed and marked G and H. On the night of the 27th Admiral Brown appeared, and with his squadron attacked that of Admiral Lobo, leaving me, as you may readily suppose, a little inconvenienced. I appeared one of them, and when his shot began to affect us, I got under way and separated about two miles from the combatants. After a most severe and desperate attack on the weathermost ship, a frigate of 60 guns, called the Emperatrice, the remainder of the squadron got under way, stood off, leaving the squadron of Brown in close combat, who soon after withdrew, steering after the fleet of Admiral Lobo. We, therefore, have no information of him. The odds as to ships and guns are several hundred per cent. in favor of the Brazilians, yet the undaunted spirit of Brown and his followers seem to make up the deficit. Under the impression that Admiral Lobo would be absent some time, I concluded to await a few days his return, in order to receive his written note. On the morning of the 4th instant he arrived, and I was presented with the enclosed, marked I. I replied by the enclosed, marked K, and received for answer the enclosed, marked L. This opens to us an extent of coast 900 miles which has been heretofore considered in rigorous blockade.

The accompanying communication, marked M, is a copy of my note to the United States Consul at Montevideo, and his reply.

The English and French forces restlessly acquiesce in the blockade with evidently disturbed feelings; they have millions at stake where we have only pounds. The Brazilians have a force of 250 pieces of cannon, which is quite enough to carry into complete effect the blockade, but its energies are so badly directed that it is evaded almost daily by merchant vessels of all the various nations; and in order to extend the same terms that were in the first instance offered to vessels found at Buenos Ayres on the proclamation of the blockade, by Captain Christyvalier, of the French national brig Alacrity, who arrived at Buenos Ayres on the 9th April, in a passage of two days from Montevideo, we are informed that Admiral Lobo would permit the French ship Olindo, which had passed unseen by his squadron, to take in a cargo with free permission to depart the port. I presume he will extend the same to all nations, thereby directly encouraging a violation of his own blockade. Whilst Admiral Lobo remains in one position off the Ortiz, Admiral Brown, with a temporarily fitted force, occupies the whole river of La Plata, and, under the guns of Montevideo and Colonia, captures and runs on shore, burns, and drives out and into port both the naval and merchant vessels of his enemy. Whilst he is moving with great energy, his Government seems to remain most completely inactive, waiting, as I am informed, the mediation of England to close the difference with the Emperor of Brazil. There are many diplomatic points in connexion with both nations on which I could enlarge, but I refrain, as I presume our accredited agents keep the Government constantly advised of them.

It may perhaps be proper to explain to you my motive in attempting the passage of the Rio de la Plata. I will briefly remark, that as I had visited the capital of his Imperial Majesty the Emperor of Brazil, that, in justice to his enemy, I felt myself most imperiously called upon, under our strict neutral character, to show the Cyane before Buenos Ayres, which, with some risk to her, I was enabled to do.

This evening I shall depart hence for Rio de Janeiro.

With great respect, I have the honor to be your obedient servant,

J. D. ELLIOTT.

Hon. SAMUEL L. SOUTHARD, Secretary of the Navy, Washington City.

Extract from the Log-Book of the United States Ship Cyane, April 3, 1826.

"At 8 a. m., moderate, pleasant weather; at 9, discovered the vessels at anchor ahead to be the Brazilian blockading squadron, about ten miles E. SE. of the SE. end of the Ortiz Bank; at 9.30, observed five vessels-of-war under way, standing towards us; at 10, made them to be one frigate, one corvette, and three brigs; prepared for battle, and showed our colors; at 11, shortened sail to the topsails, and hauled up for the Brazilian squadron under way; at 11.30, the frigate was on the lee beam at about 150 yards distance, two brigs on the lee bow, the other a little on the weather quarter, and the corvette astern and to leeward; at 11.40, hailed the frigate and asked her name; answered, his Imperial Majesty's frigate Maria de Gloria. The name of our ship was then asked and given, succeeded by a demand that a boat should be sent. This demand was peremptorily refused by Captain Elliott, adding that a boat should never be sent from his ship, although one would be received; observed the guns of the frigate trained and tompions out; kept the larboard guns on the main-deck manned for the frigate and her consorts on the lee bow, and manned the starboard quarter deck guns for the brig on the weather quarter; observed the brig on the weather shortly after drop astern; at 11.45, received a boat from the frigate and brig, with two officers, who were introduced to Captain Elliott in his cabin, by whom he was informed that the port of Buenos Ayres was blockaded, and he could not be permitted to proceed. To which he replied, that if even he were to admit their right to proclaim the blockade of an extent of coast against a civil marine, he could not against neutral vessels-of-war; that both English and French vessels-of-war were in the habit of proceeding, almost daily, to and from Montevideo and Buenos Ayres, as instanced both in the British and French corvettes Chasseur and Fawn; that he would allow him 30 minutes to deliberate on his future actions, and at the expiration of that time he would proceed, prepared to resist all consequences; that the flag he wore carried under it the sovereignty of the soil it represented; that violated, the soil became invaded; and that he should defend his ship to the last moment. Captain Elliott further observed to the officer that he had a communication for Admiral Lobo, which was requested. Captain Elliott declined giving it to the officer until he returned from his frigate and discovered her true character. At 12, the Brazilian boats left the ship; during all this time the weatherly position of the ship was maintained, and every other precaution taken to resist, with effect, an attack from the squadron, which appeared to be meditated; at 12.20, hailed the frigate to know if they had any further communication to make; they answered by asking if Captain Elliott would send the Admiral's letters and papers; yes, was the reply, if you will send a boat; at 12.45, a boat came alongside for letters and papers for the Admiral, with the compliments of the commanding officer to Captain Elliott, tendering every civility, and offering any supplies he might be in want of, with his best wishes for a speedy and pleasant passage to Buenos Ayres; Captain Elliott returned his compliments and thanks, adding that his ship was abundantly supplied with every necessary, and that all he wanted was a free and generous intercourse with all nations, concluding with an offer to be the bearer of any communication the commanding officer, or any other in the squadron, might have to make with Buenos Ayres; at 1, the Brazilian boat departed; bore up, passed within hail of the Brazilian squadron along their line; made all sail for Buenos Ayres."

UNITED STATES SHIP CYANE, off the Ortiz Bank, April 3, 1826.

SIR: The undersigned, commanding the United States naval force on the coast of Brazil, begs leave to submit for the consideration of Admiral Lobo, commanding his Imperial Majesty's forces at the Rio de la Plata, a few remarks on the subject of the blockade recently proclaimed by him of the whole extent of coast of the Republic of Buenos Ayres, and all those on the Oriental side of the La Plata, an extent of nearly thirty degrees of latitude.

The United States, just in her intercourse with the nations on both sides of the hemisphere, will expect a correspondent return. She has steadfastly contended for and uniformly sustained the point, that she will not submit to the terms of a blockade of a whole coast of nearly thirty degrees of latitude, such as you have been pleased to set forth in your manifesto of the 21st of December last; and the undersigned begs leave to remark to Admiral Lobo that, whilst the United States will observe a strict neutrality between the parties in the present contest, she will most steadfastly and scrupulously defend a point which she has already waded through a bloody but a successful war in the maintenance of. The intelligence of an officer vested with the command of a force of the magnitude of the present, it is presumed, will induce him to look into and search for information of those authorities which treat on international law and can enlighten and illume the mind. He will there have brought to his view the terms of the armed neutrality of 1780, which settled all those points amongst the different European nations. Great Britain, then the most powerful of the maritime nations in the world, in a convention with the Empire of Russia, entered into in 1801, stipulated "That, in order to determine what characterized a blockaded port, that denomination is only given to a port where there is, by the disposition of the Power that attacks it with ships stationary or sufficiently near, an evident danger in entering." It is needless to say that the other Powers of Europe, as well as the United States, then the only independent one of the great western world, never having disputed the principle, it could not be otherwise regarded than as the established line drawn between all. It commenced with the present century, and is equally clear that it must be so considered at this time, notwithstanding the violations practiced in recent days. So satisfied with the correctness of this principle was the Government of Great Britain, that, in the year 1804, in consequence of a remonstrance made by the American Government against a declaration of a general blockade "of the islands of Martinique and Guadaloupe," proclaimed by the British naval commander, orders were issued to him "not to consider any blockade of these islands existing, unless in respect to particular ports which may be actually invested, and then not to capture vessels bound to such ports unless they have been previously warned not to enter them." The United States will not acknowledge a blockade as valid against its civil marine unless confined to particular ports, each one having stationed before it a force sufficiently great to prevent the entry of all vessels carrying materials to succor the besieged; and no vessel shall be seized, even in attempting to enter the port so blockaded, till she has been previously warned off and the fact endorsed on her register. The undersigned will also avail himself of this occasion to express his regret that the representative of his Imperial Majesty should have found it necessary to adopt a course in relation to the United States so well calculated to disturb the harmony and good feelings which exist between the two Governments; that whilst he has the disposition to present to Admiral Lobo an earnest of those feelings of his Government when she stepped forth first from among the nations of the earth in the recognition of the Empire of Brazil as, amongst them, free, sovereign, and independent, he will also assure him that indemnity will be claimed, and, if necessary, the undersigned will feel himself called upon to bring into operation that arm of the nation's naval force placed subject to his control in repelling all improper encroachments on American vessels and on her maritime and neutral rights.

With great respect and consideration, I have the honor to subscribe, your obedient servant,

J. D. ELLIOTT.

His Excellency Don Rodrigo José Ferr. Lobo,
Vice Admiral of the Forces of his Imperial Majesty the Emperor of Brazil.

[Translation.]

On board the Imperial Brazilian Corvette Liberal,
At anchor in the River la Plata, April 6, 1826.

The undersigned Vice Admiral, commanding the naval forces stationed in the River de la Plata, informs the illustrious Signor J. D. Elliott, commanding the naval forces of the United States on the coast of Brazil, that he has before him his note of the 3d instant, relative to the blockade which his Majesty the Emperor of Brazil has ordered to be declared against all the ports on the western bank of the River de la Plata, as well as against those on the eastern bank which may be in the possession of the enemy; these ports, and likewise those from the coast of Patagonia to Bahia Branca, are the ones which it is the intention of the undersigned to blockade. The ports, also, which are between the rivers Parana and Uruguay ought to be considered as under blockade by the ships which are cruising in the River la Plata, inasmuch as the latter river is the entry to the others; and to blockade a port it is not necessary to be always in sight of it, but it is sufficient to cruise about the place which forms its entry. For example, the undersigned might blockade Buenos Ayres while at Dos Bancos de Ortiz, and did so while on the bank of the River la Plata. This is his opinion, and he believes that nothing can be reasonably urged against it.

The undersigned would be the first to acknowledge the amity subsisting between the Cabinet of the United States and that of the Empire of Brazil; and he hopes that he will give no cause for the slightest dissension or misunderstanding between the two Governments. Nor ought the commission with which the undersigned is intrusted to be productive of detrimental consequences to either nation; because nothing is more easy, when a good understanding subsists, than to conform to the established laws of a blockade, which laws the undersigned has not departed from, inasmuch as his mode of proceeding with the vessels of allied nations has been as follows: Whenever the undersigned has met with vessels of allied nations he has informed them the ports of the Republic of Buenos Ayres were under blockade, and has directed a note to be attached to their passports stating this fact. Until the present, all have obeyed. Slight difficulties have arisen; but, in the end, all have obeyed, with the exception of an American schooner, which, after being examined, entered the port of Montevideo, and there obtained a passport, if I rightly remember, to double Cape Horn, and, going out, entered again by the northern channel, and afterwards proceeded to Buenos Ayres. She is now a schooner-of-war of that Republic, called the Sarando.

The undersigned is of opinion that he has forces more than sufficient to blockade the ports of the River la Plata. Until the present day he has not met with any vessels of allied nations which were not bound to Buenos Ayres. He conceives, however, that he has fulfilled his duty by being in sight of Buenos Ayres, or even at Dos Bancos, according to the established principle for blockading a port; and any vessel whatever, being warned in the manner which the undersigned continues to give warning, is liable to the established laws if she afterwards violates the blockade.

The undersigned is of opinion that he has satisfactorily answered the note which he received, dated the 3d of April; but, if this reply is not sufficient, recourse must be had to the Cabinet of the Empire of Brazil at Rio de Janeiro.

The undersigned profits by this opportunity to assure the illustrious Signor commanding the naval forces of the United States of America on the coast of Brazil of the consideration and respect with which he has the honor to salute him.

RODRIGO JOSÉ FERA. LOBO, Vice Admiral.

F.

UNITED STATES SHIP CYANE, off Montevideo, May 4, 1826.

SIR: There is still one letter of your excellency to which I feel called upon to reply. In taking leave of the subject we have had under discussion, I will briefly remark that I have not yet seen the grounds on which his Imperial Majesty presents the justice of his blockade of the extent you set forth in answer to my note of the 3d ultimo. Second, that because some of the European Powers have attempted to introduce a system most pernicious to the commerce of non-belligerents, the justice of a similar action on the part of one of the youngest Governments on this side of the hemisphere can by no means be made apparent. If there is authority, I should be glad to see it; and will submit, for your further consideration, some other on the subject of blockade which is new to us on this side of the water, and requires great circumpection in the introduction of a system which, in the end, may be quoted and used successfully against us. The following is of British origin, strengthened by reference to those able writers on international law, Grotius and Vattel.

"Chitty on Belligerent Powers and Neutral Rights; Boston edition, pages 129, 130, 131, and 132.

"It is under this impression that tribunals of the law of nations, before they have enforced the provisions of a blockade, have uniformly required it to be established by clear and unequivocal evidence, first, that the party proceeded against has had due notice of the existence of the blockade; and secondly, that the squadron allotted for the purposes of its execution was fully competent to cut off all communications with the interdicted port. These points have been deemed so indispensably requisite to the existence of a legal blockade, that the failure of either of them has been held to amount to an entire defeasance of the measure, and this even in cases where the notification of it has issued immediately from the fountain of supreme authority."(*)

"The blockade must not only have been declared by competent authority, but must be also an actually existing blockade. A blockade is then only to be considered as actually existing when there is a power to enforce it.(†) 'The very notion of a complete blockade,' said Sir William Scott, in the case of the Stert,(‡) 'includes that the besieging force can apply its power to every point of the blockaded State. If it cannot, there is no blockade of that part where its power cannot be brought to bear.' We find, however, from the case of the Frederick Molke,(§) that 'it is not an accidental absence of the blockading force, nor the circumstance of being blown off by wind, (if the suspension, and the reason of the suspension, are known) that will be sufficient in law to remove a blockade.' But if the relaxation happen not by such accidents as these, but by mere remissness of the cruisers stationed to maintain the blockade, (who are too apt, by permitting the passage of some vessels, to give fair grounds to others for supposing the blockade concluded,) then it is impossible for a court of justice to say that the blockade is actually existing. 'It is in vain,' said Sir William Scott, in the case of the Jaffrow Maria Schroeder,(‖) 'for Goverments to impose blockades, if those employed on that service will not enforce them. The inconvenience is very great, and spreads far beyond the individual case. Reports are eagerly circulated that the blockade is raised; foreigners take advantage of the information; the property of innocent persons is ensnared, and the honor of our own country is involved in the mistake.'"

Perhaps I may be considered as travelling a little out of the strict path of my duty as a naval commander when I present for your information those authorities on international law; but when one feels disposed not to call forth unpleasant discussion with our respective Governments, there is always a hope when light can be shed, and this reference seems to meet the present case at issue.

I did not expect you would have introduced the case of the Grace Anne; it is one to which you may have supposed I had an allusion in the closing paragraph of my communication. She was a trading vessel belonging to citizens of the United States, from one of its ports, destined for Buenos Ayres. Since the receipt of your note, the particulars of her case as well as those of the brigs Henry, of Portland, and the Joseph, of Boston, have been presented to me through an official source; the former, it appears, was taken forcible possession of off the Ortiz by your squadron, brought back to Montevideo, and there detained three days as a prize; and, at the same time, the master was denied all opportunity of having intercourse with the shore, or of communicating with the United States Consul; and she was further detained full three weeks in your possession, on the pretext that she had more goods on board than was stated in the manifest of her cargo. The Henry was also boarded off Buenos Ayres, the vessel overhauled, the mate and one of the seamen most cruelly beaten; and the Joseph was also taken possession of off Montevideo, there held, the vessel drifted about by the current and returned to the master, her geographical position not then known, and was eventually lost on the English Bank. These points are presented for your explanation. I will further beg leave to remark to your excellency, it has been always admitted that when a blockade is established first on lawful principles, a trading vessel has a right to present herself before any force there, to be warned not to enter the port. Should a further attempt be made, she may be taken possession of, and, under the forms of a trial, be condemned, it becomes a matter on which the vessel and cargo is the only forfeit. I am somewhat at a loss to perceive how your excellency can believe your force stationed in the blockade of all the ports of the Rio de la Plata, according to maritime principles, being in a line parallel to a shore distant on one side 30 miles, and on the other 17, and from the three most important ports more than 100 miles, commanding the space between your buoys, where vessels may pass and repass unseen, at their pleasure, instanced in the arrival at Buenos Ayres, whilst my ship lay there, of an American, of a French, and of two English brigs, all richly ladened.

(*) This was decided in the Court of Appeal, in February, 1792, Dr. Phillimore on License Trade, 52, in notes.

Possessed of a fleet of nearly fifty sail wearing the flag of his Imperial Majesty and now in the La Plata, Admiral Brown, from a declared blockaded port, with a temporarily fitted force of only six vessels, passes and repasses at pleasure, in your presence and within 20 miles of you, attacks and captures at Colonia and Montevideo both his Imperial Majesty's vessels-of-war, as also those of his subjects; this fact is instanced in the arrival within the space of six days of six prizes at Buenos Ayres.

On closing this, the undersigned begs leave to call your excellency's attention to his former communication setting forth the views of his Government on the subject of blockade, and trusts they will meet with the entire approbation of his Imperial Majesty.

With high consideration, the undersigned has the honor to subscribe, your obedient servant,

UNITED STATES SHIP CYANE, Montevideo, April 25, 1826.

SIR: The very frank and free conversation I had with your excellency this morning has greatly relieved my mind on the subject of the further bearing you intend your blockade to have on the commerce of the United States; and I will be frank to say that my Government cannot nor will not object to the proclamation of Buenos Ayres and Ensenada in close blockade, and made so by the force you at present have in the La Plata, leaving the outer coast and that of Patagonia, and the northern coast of the Banda Oriental, not designated.

With high consideration, and with great personal esteem, I have the honor to remain your excellency's most obedient servant,

J. D. ELLIOTT.

UNITED STATES SHIP CYANE, Montevideo, April 27, 1826.

The undersigned would suggest to his excellency Vice Admiral Lobo the propriety of our settling, previous to separating at this time, the grounds on which the blockade in the River la Plata should be conducted in relation to the commerce of the United States. This, the undersigned feels well assured, will be productive of a continuance of those harmonious feelings which at present exist in our respective Governments.

With high consideration and respect, I have the honor to subscribe, your obedient servant,

J. D. ELLIOTT.

ON BOARD THE CORVETTE LIBERAL, at anchor in sight of Montevideo, April 27, 1826.

The undersigned, Vice Admiral commanding the naval forces of the Brazilian Empire in the River la Plata, has considered the two notes which were addressed to him by the illustrious Signor J. D. Elliott, commanding the frigate Cyane, of the United States of America, relative to the blockade of the ports of the Republic of Buenos Ayres, as declared in the proclamation of the undersigned, approved by his Government. The illustrious Signor J. D. Elliott is unwilling to conform to this blockade in its whole extent, but only with regard to Buenos Ayres and Ensenada, and thinks that all the other ports ought not to be considered under blockade. In this opinion the undersigned cannot agree with the illustrious Signor J. D. Elliott, who pretends that all the other ports, both within and without the Rio la Plata, should be excluded from the blockade; and the undersigned reminds the illustrious Signor J. D. Elliott that it was his decided opinion, in the conference which they had, that all the ports comprehended within the Rio de la Plata, that is, from Capes Santa Maria and Santa Antonio within, where his ships generally were, were under a rigorous blockade. The undersigned hopes that he has satisfied the illustrious Signor J. D. Elliott; but if the decision should not be satisfactory to him, he may apply to the Court at Rio de Janeiro where he will be completely satisfied. The undersigned is not competent to revoke what has been approved by his Government, and he can do no more, on this occasion, than suggest the arguments which offer themselves to him relative to the matter in question.

It remains to the undersigned to make the protestations of esteem and consideration with which, &c., &c.

RODRIGO JOSÉ FERR'A LOBOS, Vice Admiral.

The Illustrious Signor J. D. ELLIOTT.

UNITED STATES SHIP CYANE, off Montevideo, May 4, 1826.

SIR: The undersigned has the honor to acknowledge the receipt of the communication of his excellency Vice Admiral Lobo of the present date; and in answer he has to remark that he understood distinctly from your excellency's declaration at the conference to which you allude, that the blockade you intended hereafter to enforce was confined to the ports within the Rio de la Plata; and that the coast outside was no longer to be considered as in blockade; this was also the understanding of his officer, who had conference with your excellency the succeeding day.

The undersigned has the honor to subscribe your excellency's most obedient servant,

J. D. ELLIOTT.

DON RODRIGO JOSÉ FERR'A LOBO,
Vice Admiral commanding the Brazilian Forces at the Rio de la Plata.

L.

I acknowledge the receipt of your note, dated to-day, in reply to the one which I addressed to you relative to the ports which I hold to be rigorously blockaded, which are those within the River de la Plata from Cape Santa Maria and Cape Santa Antonio, both on the eastern and western bank, with the exception of Montevideo. This was my fixed opinion in the conference which I had with you, and I cannot alter it in any respect. If you understand it differently, I am not to be blamed, inasmuch as I have the misfortune not to understand your language; and I cannot be responsible for the errors which may have been committed by the individuals who acted as interpreters.

You are aware that my proclamation having been approved by his Imperial Majesty, it is not in my power to revoke what has been published; and I do not a little in considering only the ports which I have mentioned above as under rigorous blockade.

This is all that suggests itself to communicate to you relative to the matter in question.

It remains to me to salute you with all consideration and respect.

God preserve you.

On board the corvette Liberal, anchored in front of Montevideo, May 4, 1826.

RODRIGO JOSÉ FERRA. LOBO, Vice Admiral.

The Illustrious Signor J. D. ELLIOTT.

UNITED STATES SHIP CYANE, Montevideo, April 1, 1826.

SIR: The Government of the United States has assigned to me a cruise on the coast of Brazil for the double purpose of having communication with our public agents on shore, as also to give protection to our trade. If you have any communication to make on the subject of either, I will be glad to receive it at an early moment, and will be most happy to see you on board the United States ship Cyane.

This will be handed to you by Mr. Auchmuty, one of my officers.

With great respect, your obedient servant,

J. D. ELLIOTT.

JAMES BOND, Esq., Vice Consul of the United States at Montevideo.

CONSULATE OF THE UNITED STATES, Montevideo, April 26, 1826.

SIR: In compliance with the request made in your note of the 1st instant, I have the honor to enclose a report of the circumstances which have had an injurious tendency upon the American commerce at this place since the commencement of the war between the Emperor of Brazil and the United Provinces of the Rio de la Plata. This report has been drawn up by my brother, then acting Vice Consul, during a temporary absence from this place.

I have the honor to be, sir, your very obedient servant,

JOSHUA BOND, Consul of the United States.

J. D. ELLIOTT, Esq., Commander of the United States Naval Forces, &c.

CONSULATE OF THE UNITED STATES, Montevideo April 25, 1826.

On the 16th of December information was received, by an arrival from Rio de Janeiro, that the Emperor of Brazil had determined to commence hostilities against the Republic of the United Provinces of the Rio de la Plata, and, on the 22d of the same month, an official notice was received at this consulate from Vice Admiral Lobo, commander of the Brazilian naval forces in this river, dated 20th of the same month, of his intention to blockade the ports of Buenos Ayres, to commence from the date of his communication; and on the evening of the next day several vessels sailed from the port to enforce the blockade. The effect of this measure was soon felt by the commerce of the United States; several vessels which had touched here, bound to Buenos Ayres, either entered or sought other markets, and several others arrived which had been warned off by the squadron.

On the 31st of December I was informed that the schooner Grace Anne, of Baltimore, had been brought into the port under charge of a prize crew, and that the master and crew were confined on board, and denied permission to come on shore. I immediately waited on Admiral Lobo to make inquiries into the cause of her seizure, and was informed by him that she was detained on suspicion either of having attempted to pass the squadron, after being warned off, or of having more goods on board than were contained in the manifest. He assured me that he would go on board without delay, make inquiry into the charges alleged against the vessel, and inform me of the result. On the following day I addressed a note to Admiral Lobo, requesting that the master, who was reported to be severely indisposed, might be permitted to land, which was granted; but not receiving any communication from the Admiral, I addressed a second note to him on the 3d, demanding a release of the officers and crew. No attention, however, being paid to this demand, I made a representation of the affair, on the 4th, to the Viscount de Laguna, the Captain General of the Province; and late in the evening of the same day a note from Admiral Lobo was received, enclosing the vessel's papers, in which he stated that the charges alleged against the schooner were without foundation, and that he would immediately despatch a vessel for that part of the crew who were detained on board the squadron, which was accordingly done, and the men restored to the vessel. The matter thus ended without any explanation or apology being made.

By a letter dated the 19th of January the Viscount de Laguna made known to me that, in consequence of neutral vessels having cleared out from this port for the Pacific, and, subsequently, eluding the blockading squadron, no vessel would be suffered to depart with cargoes other than the produce of this province, unless the master or consignees should previously give bonds to the amount of the vessel and cargo that they would not enter the ports of Buenos Ayres, and, upon enforcing this order, the bonds were required to be secured by a lien on real estate. One American vessel, the ship Superior, of New York, complied with this order, but it has not been enforced in any other case, and has been virtually abandoned.

On the 1st of March the brig Joseph, of Boston, sailed from this port, and was the next day lost upon the English Bank. The master stated, in his protest, that the same evening he was fired at and brought to by a Brazilian brig-of-war which was in sight at the time of his sailing, and ordered to send his boat on board, which he refused. He was afterwards repeatedlv fired at, and was detained until the next day afternoon, and attributed the loss of his vessel to his having been carried out of his course by the Brazilian vessel.

These comprise the only instances in which our commerce has suffered any detriment in this quarter since the commencement of the war; and, in order to make you more correctly acquainted with the facts, I enclose copies of the correspondence with Admiral Lobo, and also the letter of the Viscount de Laguna referred to above.

Yours, &c.,

JAMES BOND.

JOSHUA BOND, Consul of the United States, Montevideo.

CONSULATE OF THE UNITED STATES, Montevideo, January 2, 1826.

SIR: Frequent representations having been made to me respecting the dangerous and increasing illness of the captain of the American schooner Grace Anne, of Baltimore, now under seizure in this port, and fearing lest the state of the weather may prevent your excellency from visiting the vessel today, I request that permission be given for him to come on shore.

As it appears to be absolutely necessary that assistance should be rendered him without delay, which cannot be properly done on board, and as the permission cannot affect the truth of the reports alleged against him, I hope your excellency will be pleased to grant the order as promptly as the urgency of his situation demands.

I have the honor to be your excellency's most obedient servant.

Sent about 2 o'clock.

CONSULATE OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, Montevideo, January 3, 1826.

The undersigned has the honor of informing his excellency Admiral Lobo that he has received a letter from Captain John Boddily, master of the American schooner Grace Anne, of Baltimore, now in this port, stating the circumstances of his seizure and detention by a Brazilian squadron in the river Plate, and demanding his interference in his behalf.

According to Captain Boddily's statement, it appears that, on the 28th of December last, while proceeding on his voyage from Santos, in Brazil, to Buenos Ayres, he was boarded in the river Plate, off Point Indio, by an officer from a brig bearing the flag of his Imperial Majesty the Emperor of Brazil, and himself and the papers of the vessel taken on board the said brig, where he was detained until the next morning, when he was sent on board the brig in company, called the Masseo, and after some hours' further detention, was returned to his own vessel, accompained by an officer and prize crew, who, having sent his second mate and four seamen on board the Masseo, brought the vessel to this port, where she arrived on the evening of the 30th; and since arrival Captain Boddily and his crew have not been allowed to leave the vessel nor communicate with the shore, in consequence of which he has been unable to make known his situation to the Consul of the United States.

In the interview which the undersigned had with his excellency Admiral Lobo on the morning of the 1st, but before he was in possession of any positive information of this subject, his excellency informed him that the vessel was detained on suspicion of having more cargo than her manifest could account for, and also that he had either attempted to pass the squadron after having been notified of the blockade, or that she had endeavored to escape pursuit when first discovered by the squadron, and, if the undersigned comprehended his excellency, these suspicions originated since her arrival in this port. If the undersigned misunderstood the charges, he requests to be more explicitly informed respecting them.

As far, then, as the undersigned can ascertain, no positive charges are alleged against Captain Boddily, but himself and his crew have been confined on reports which the undersigned is assured are without foundation, and the truth and falsehood of which could have been ascertained on the slightest examination, and yet no attempt has been made to investigate them.

It is now the duty of the undersigned to ask his excellency Admiral Lobo that Captain Boddily, and such of his crew as remain on board the vessel, be immediately released, and that orders be sent with all possible despatch to liberate the men confined on board the Masseo, and restore them to the vessel from which they were taken, unless evidence can be produced to justify these proceedings.

The undersigned has the honor to be his excellency's obedient servant.

Delivered 11 o'clock.

CONSULATE OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, Montevideo, January 4, 1826.

The undersigned, Vice Consul of the United States of America, has the honor to represent to his excellency Viscondo da Laguna that the American schooner Grace Anne, of Baltimore, John Boddily master, while proceeding on her voyage from Santos, in Brazil, to Buenos Ayres, on the 28th of December last, then being in the river Plate, off Point Indio, was fired at and brought to by a brig bearing the flag of his Imperial Majesty the Emperor of Brazil, and afterwards boarded by an officer from said brig, and Captain Boddily and the papers of the vessel taken on board, where he was detained all night, exposed to the weather, on the deck of the vessel, although at that time he was suffering under an excruciating disease, and had been confined to his bed for some days. The next morning he was sent on board a ship in company, called the Masseo, and after some hours' further detention he was returned to his vessel, accompanied by an officer and prize crew, who, having removed the second mate and four seamen to the Masseo, proceeded with the vessel to Montevideo. They arrived in this port on the evening of the 30th December, since which time Captain Boddily and his remaining crew have not been permitted to leave the vessel, nor communicate with shore, by the orders, as he was informed, of his excellency Admiral Lobo, in consequence of which he was unable to make known his situation to the Consul of the United States until the night of the 2d instant, when permission was obtained for him to land.

In an interview which the undersigned had with Vice Admiral Lobo on this subject, but before he had received any authentic information respecting it, he was informed by his excellency that he did not consider her as a prize, but that she was detained on suspicion of having more cargo than was included in the manifest, and also that she had either attempted to pass the squadron after having been informed of the blockade, or (for his excellency did not seem to know the exact nature of the charge) she had endeavored to escape when first descried by the squadron; and, if the undersigned comprehended his excellency, these suspicions had originated since the arrival of the vessel in this port, and were not suggested by the officer who seized her, and who does not appear to have assigned any cause for his conduct. If these charges were misunderstood by the undersigned, he requests that he may be more correctly informed of their nature. His excellency Vice Admiral Lobo, at the same time, assured the undersigned that he would examine into those reports that afternoon, or without fail the next morning, and acquaint him with the result of his investigation, but no communication has yet been received from his excellency on that subject.

From all the undersigned can learn, it appears, then, that this vessel has been seized without any known pretext, the captain and crew rigorously confined and debarred from all communication at a time when the situation of the former required assistance, on reports which the undersigned is assured are without foundation, and the truth or falsehood of which could have been ascertained on the slightest examination, yet no disposition to investigate them has been shown.

The undersigned not having received any answer to his applications on this subject in another quarter, it now becomes his duty, in order that speedy justice be rendered to the sufferers in this case, to request, in the name of his Government, that his excellency Visconde da Laguna will cause immediate inquiries to be made into the charges alleged against the captain and crew, and unless evidence can be produced sufficient to authorize their further detention, that Captain Boddily, and such of his crew as remain on board the vessel, be set at liberty; that those of the crew who are confined on board the brig Masseo be restored to the vessel from which they were unjustly taken as speedily as circumstances will allow, and that immediate restitution be made of the vessel and cargo; and further claims, in behalf of Captain Boddily, officers, crew, and all others concerned, compensation for all damages they may have incurred by the illegal seizure and detention of themselves and vessel.

The undersigned cannot close this communication without protesting against the conduct of the officers who sent the vessel into port, and requesting an explanation of the causes which led him to adopt this measure; for the maltreatment of Captain Boddily and detention of his crew; nor without expressing his sincere wish that, in representing this affair to his Government, he may be able to give assurance that no outrage of this kind will occur in future.

The undersigned takes this occasion to tender to his excellency Visconde da Laguna the assurance of his consideration and profound respect.

Sent 6 o'clock, p. m.

To the illustrious Signor the Vice Consul of the United States of America:

I have received the note which you addressed to me under date of the 2d instant, and, with regard to the request contained in it, that I will permit the captain of the American schooner, who is ill on board of her, to be removed on shore, I have to inform you that I yesterday told the said captain, as likewise the supercargo, that they might go on shore, which liberation, I am pleased to find, coincides with your request.

I profit by the occasion to present you my consideration and esteem. God preserve you many years.

Headquarters of the Marine in Montevideo, 3d of January, 1826.

RODRIGO JOSÉ FERR. LOBO, Vice Admiral.

To the illustrious Signor James Bond, Vice Consul of the United States:

I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter dated the 3d instant; and in reply to its contents I have to inform you that, having proceeded to examine the cargo on board the schooner Grace Anne, I found it to be the same as that stated in the manifest, which I remit to you, together with the passport and other documents. You may therefore take charge of the ship; and I intend to-morrow to withdraw my men and to send aboard the corvette Masseo to look for the men belonging to the said schooner, and, when they are found, I will replace them on board of her.

I profit by this opportunity to salute you with all consideration and respect. God preserve you many years.

Headquarters of the Marine in Montevideo, 4th of January, 1826.

RODRIGO JOSÉ FERR. LOBO, Vice Admiral.

MONTEVIDEO, January 5, 1826.

The Captain General Viscount da Laguna having been informed that the affair of the detention of the American schooner Grace Anne, which was the subject of the official note addressed to him under date of yesterday by the illustrious Signor James Bond, Vice Consul of the United States, has been settled; it only remains to him to acknowledge the receipt of the said note, and to profit by this opportunity of making his compliments to the Signor, and assuring him of his consideration and esteem.

VISCOUNT DA LAGUNA.

The Illustrious Signor JAMES BOND, Vice Consul of the United States.

MONTEVIDEO, January 19, 1826.

ILLUSTRIOUS SIR: Having understood that several merchant vessels belonging to neutral and friendly nations, abusing the passports which they obtained from this Government for ports in the Pacific, and taking advantage of accidents which it was not in the power of the blockading squadron to guard against, have entered the ports of the Republic of Buenos Ayres, and that merchants, animated with the hope of like success, are preparing expeditions with a similar destination, I have determined that no vessels of neutral nations, unless their cargo consists of the produce of this province, shall be permitted to clear out until their captains or consignees have first deposited in the treasury of the place a legal bond, equivalent to the integral value of the goods which they may export according to the prices current of the market, in order that they may not abuse the passports of this Government, nor enter into the ports of the Republic of Buenos Ayres; which resolution I communicate to you, in order that you may impart it to the captains or masters of merchant vessels of your nation.

God preserve you.

VISCOUNT DA LAGUNA.

UNITED STATES SHIP CYANE, Montevideo, April 27, 1826.

SIR: Herewith I have to acknowledge the receipt of your communication of the 26th, together with its several enclosures.

I am prepared to receive the seaman whom John Thomas, master of the brig Lincoln, of Boston, complained of; he had, therefore, better be sent off to-day. I am also prepared to receive the seaman you have demanded from the Brazilian Navy.

With great respect, your obedient servant,

J. D. ELLIOTT.

JOSHUA BOND, Esq., Consul of the United States at Montevideo.

UNITED STATES SHIP CYANE, off Montevideo, April 28, 1826.

SIR: Herewith I have to apprise you that my negotiation with his excellency Vice Admiral Lobo, commanding the naval forces of his Imperial Majesty the Emperor of Brazil, blockading the Rio de la Plata, have eventuated thus: that, henceforth, the blockade proclaimed in December last, of the ports of the United Provinces of the La Plata and those of the Banda Oriental, shall be confined to those of the La Plata only, and that all outside are considered no longer blockaded; that American merchant vessels shall, on presenting before his squadron, be warned not to enter ports in the river, with the fact endorsed on their register, which will not deny them, as heretofore, the privilege of entering any one of the ports along the northern or southern coast. This fact you will cause to be communicated to our countrymen interested in the subject.

I have the honor to subscribe, your obedient servant,

J. D. ELLIOTT.

JOSHUA BOND, Esq., Consul of the United States at Montevideo.

UNITED STATES SHIP CYANE, off Montevideo, May 5, 1826.

SIR: You will receive enclosed a copy of the official communication of his excellency Rodrigo José Ferreira Lobo, commanding his Imperial Majesty the Emperor of Brazil's forces, employed in blockading at the La Plata; this you will be pleased to apprise our countrymen of in such way as may be deemed most proper for the occasion.

With great respect, your obedient servant,

J. D. ELLIOTT.

JOSHUA BOND, Esq., Consul of the United States at Montevideo.

UNITED STATES SHIP CYANE, off Montevideo May 5, 1826.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 25th ultimo. In answer I have to reply, that I have had intercourse with his excellency Vice Admiral Lobo on the subject of a privilege previously granted the French ship Olinda; the Vice Admiral denies positively that he gave permission to that ship to depart the port of Buenos Ayres with a cargo, and, of course, he could not extend it to the vessels of other nations. After some considerable close and warm correspondence with his excellency, he agreed to withdraw his blockade of all the ports and coasts without the Rio de la Plata. A copy of his letter is herewith enclosed for your inspection, and for the use of all our countrymen at Buenos Ayres.

With great respect, I have the honor to be your obedient servant,

J. D. ELLIOTT.

JOHN M. FORBES, Esq., in charge of the Affairs of the United States at Buenos Ayres.

Captain J. D. Elliott to the Secretary of the Navy.

UNITED STATES SHIP CYANE, Rio de Janeiro, June 11, 1826.

"Until I could learn the ultimate decision on an affair which presented on the 5th instant, I have refrained from bringing to your notice an attempt which was on the eve of being made, in the examination of some of our merchant vessels, by Commander Frederic du Plantys, commanding his most Christain Majesty the King of France's frigate La Seine. Some part of his crew had deserted previous to that date; and on the 5th instant, whilst some of our merchant vessels were about departing the port, he sent one of his lieutenants on board, with instructions to obtain my permission to board and examine those vessels, with others, for his men. I directed his officer to reply that under no circumstances whatever could that permission be given, and trusted he possessed too great a sense of propriety for one moment to urge the measure, and in the event of his doing so I should resist every inch by force. I accordingly made the necessary preparation, and he abandoned the point."

EXTRACTS FROM THE CORRESPONDENCE OF COMMODORE J. BIDDLE.

Extract of a letter from Commodore James Biddle to the Secretary of the Navy, dated United States frigate Macedonian, Rio Janeiro, August 16, 1826.

"I arrived here on the 11th instant, and, upon my arrival, I saluted the flag of Brazil, and my salute as had been previously arranged, was returned, gun for gun. I found the Cyane here, waiting my arrival

The Boston is cruising, by order of Captain Elliott, off La Plata river, between Capes St. Mary and St. Antonio, for the purpose of giving information of the blockade of the river to American vessels. By two different opportunities I have written to Captain Hoffman, directing him to join me here. It is not my intention, however, to remain here until Captain Hoffman does join me, nor to permit him, in case he arrives soon after I sail, to remain here until I return. I shall probably go to sea in about a fortnight; and should I not previously see him, I shall leave orders for Captain Hoffman to cruise at sea, and to meet me here about the middle of November next.

No American vessels have been sent in here by the blockading squadron, except the brig Leonidas, belonging to Boston, and bound, when she was seized, from Canton to Buenos Ayres. She is detained, I understand, more from a suspicion that her cargo is enemy's property, than for any intention to violate the blockade, with which, in fact, it is impossible she could have been acquainted."

Extract of a letter from Commodore James Biddle to the Secretary of the Navy, dated United States frigate Macedonian, Rio Janeiro, September 10, 1826.

"The Boston sloop-of-war arrived here on the 8th instant from Montevideo, and I enclose Captain Hoffman's report to me. The presence of a public vessel of the United States in the river has a tendency, you perceive from Captain Hoffman's report, to prevent American vessels from being sent to this port for adjudication. This is of itself important service, as the delay of obtaining the acquital here of the most innocent vessel is injurious and vexatious. I have therefore directed the Boston to sail as soon as she is ready to sail, and return to the anchorage off Montevideo. I enclose a copy of my orders to Captain Hoffman; he is to meet me here in November, when he will require provisions, and which cannot be procured in the river.

"I shall sail to-morrow, and go to the north as far as Bahia. It was my intention to have sailed earlier, but when the crew of the brig Ruth were sent on board this ship, Mr. Raguet became responsible to this Government for their forthcoming; and had I sailed before the taking of their depositions, it would have been necessary to send them to the prison ship for safe keeping. There was no public object to induce me to go to sea under such circumstances. I feel the utmost repugnance to American seamen being on board the prison ship, as well because they are there in the power of the Brazilian officers, as because the prison ship is exceedingly crowded, filthy, and unhealthy. These seamen are now on board the Boston, and in a day or two will certainly be examined. After their examination it is no longer necessary that we should take care of them, and they will then be returned to the vessel to which they belong."

Extract of a letter from Beekman V. Hoffman, Esq., Commanding United States ship Boston, to Commodore James Biddle, dated Montevideo, August 26, 1826.

"I have just had the honor to receive your letter of the 13th instant by the English packet, and lost no time in proceeding agreeable to your instructions. During my anchorage off Montevideo there were three American vessels captured by the Brazilian squadron, all of which were released upon my interceding in their behalf, whose names are inserted below.

"There were several applications made to me by American seamen in the Brazilian naval service, requesting I would intercede in procuring their release, as they had been impressed. I made application for them through the American Consul, and obtained the release of three, with the assurance from the Admiral that he would not suffer an American seaman to be detained in his squadron unless regularly entered for the service."

Extract from Commodore James Biddle's instructions to Captain B. V. Hoffman, dated United States frigate Macedonian, Rio Janeiro, September 10, 1826.

"As soon as the seamen belonging to the American brig Ruth are examined, and your ship is ready to sail, be pleased to get under way and proceed to sea. The presence of the Boston at Montevideo having already been advantageous, I wish you to return thither without delay. Do not go higher up the river than Montevideo, and in case there is any fighting there, you must be careful to move your ship out of the way of it in time to avoid injury.

"Should any American vessel be seized, or any American citizens impressed or abused, use all your endeavors to obtain redress. I recommend your cultivating acquaintance and good will with the Brazil Admiral, so far, at least, as his conduct towards our countrymen will permit. Much may be effected in this way towards protecting American citizens and American property.

"Our laws wisely and humanely consider seamen as a peculiar class of citizens, and requiring the particular care of the Government. I understand that there are many Americans in the Brazil squadron, some of whom have been impressed. If any case of impressment of American seamen comes to your knowledge, use your influence to obtain their release, and provision them on board until you return to Rio Janeiro. If our Consul at Montevideo has any American seamen whom he is supporting at the public expense, receive them also on board as supernumeraries, and bring them out of the river. Receive on board, also, all American seamen who may request you to do so. The scarcity of seamen is sensibly felt within the United States, both in the public and private service, and it is important that we should aid such as have been left abroad to return home.

"I wish you to leave the anchorage of Montevideo about the first day of November next, in order to meet me here, as I shall then want the Boston to accompany me to the river. The Cyane is to meet me here early in November, and it is my wish that all three go in company to the river."

19TH CONGRESS.] No. 439. [2D SESSION.

BRITISH COLONIAL TRADE.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES DECEMBER 18, 1826.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

I transmit to Congress extracts of a letter received since the commencement of their session from the minister of the United States at London, having relation to the late discussions with the Government of Great Britain concerning the trade between the United States and the British colonies in America.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

WASHINGTON, December 8, 1826.

Extract of a despatch, No. 16, from Mr. Gallatin to Mr. Clay, dated London, October 27, 1826.

"Mr. Canning, in his official note of 11th September last, on the subject of the colonial intercourse, has the following observation respecting the provision of the act of Congress of March 1, 1823, which prevented British vessels entering American ports, except directly from the British West Indies, from clearing out for any of those colonies: 'It must not be forgotten that this enactment, founded professedly on the limitations of the British act of Parliament of 1822, is continued fourteen months after the passing of the British act of 1825, by which the limitations were done away. Since the 5th of January, 1826, an American ship trading to a British West India colony may clear out from thence to any part of the world, the United Kingdom and its dependencies alone excepted; but the British ship in the American port still remains subject to all the restrictions of the American laws of 1823,' &c. Although I did not know at the time what act of Parliament of 1825 was alluded to, I could have no doubt of the repeal of the limitations of the act of Parliament of 1823, and thus expressly stated; and the fact is accordingly taken for granted in my official answer to Mr. Canning of the 22d of September. Yet, on examining the various acts of Parliament, I have found some difficulty to discover by what act, in what manner, to what extent, and from what date, the said limitations had been actually repealed.

"The act of 1822, which contains the limitations alluded to, is that of June 24, 1822, (44th chap. of 3d Geo. 4th,) entitled 'An act to regulate the trade between his Majesty's possessions in America and the West Indies, and other places in America and the West Indies;' and the limitations in question are two. By the 3d section, goods imported in foreign ships into the free ports of the British colonies must be shipped and brought directly from the country or place of which they are the growth, produce, or manufacture. By the 4th section, goods exported from any of the said free ports in foreign ships must be exported direct to the country or State to which such ship belongs. Although Mr. Canning has used the word limitations in the plural number, it is clear that he intended to apply his observation, 'that the limitations were done away,' to the last mentioned limitation only, and not to the first.

"The act of July 5, 1825, (6th Geo. 4th, chap. 114,) entitled 'An act to regulate the trade of the British possessions abroad,' does not contain any clause repealing either of the limitations of the act of June 24, 1822. But the fourth section states that, by the law of navigation, foreign ships are permitted to import into any of the British possessions abroad, from the countries to which they belong, goods the produce of those countries, and to export goods from such possessions to be carried to any foreign country whatever.

"The law of navigation, referred to as above, must be the act also of July 5, 1825, (6th Geo. 4th, ch. 109,) entitled 'An act for the encouragement of British shipping and navigation.' It is enacted by its first section that the act shall be in force from the 5th of January, 1826, and shall constitute and be the law of navigation of the British Empire. The 11th section provides 'that no goods shall be imported into any British possessions in Asia, Africa, or America, in any foreign ships, unless they are ships of the country of which the goods are the produce, and from which the goods are imported.' The 4th and 10th sections provide against the importation, in foreign ships, into the United Kingdom or into any British possession in Asia, Africa, or America, of goods carried from any such British possession. There is not in the act any provision restricting the exportation of goods from any such British possession in foreign ships to any foreign country whatever. But the act does not expressly repeal any such restriction previously in force, nor indeed any former act whatever relating to trade and navigation. The preamble, which makes part of the first section, only states that the laws relating to the encouragement of British navigation will be repealed in consequence of another act passed in the same session of Parliament, entitled 'An act to repeal the several laws relating to the customs.'

"This last mentioned act is that of 6th Geo. 4th, ch. 105, passed also on the 5th of July, 1825. Though purporting from its title to repeal only custom-house laws, this act repreals, from and after the 5th day of July, 1826, so much and such parts of the several and respective statutes thereinafter mentioned and recited as relates to the trade and navigation of the Kingdom, or to the importation or exportation of goods, &c., &c. The statutes thus therein sanctioned and repealed amount to about four hundred and fifty, including, as I believe, all former acts relating to the trade and navigation from 17th Richard 2d to 5th Geo. 4th, ch. 94. The 16th section specially repeals so much of the navigation act, 12th Charles 2d, ch. 18, as remains unrepealed; and the 359th section repeals altogether the first above mentioned act of June 24, 1822, (3 Geo. 4th, ch. 44,) entitled 'An act to regulate the trade between his Majesty's possessions in America and the West Indies, and other places in America and the West Indies.'

"From what precedes, it follows, first, that the restriction which limits the importations in foreign vessels of goods into the British West Indies and American colonies, the vessels of the country of which the goods are the produce, and coming direct from [such] country, having been revived by the navigation act of July 5, 1825, is still in force; secondly, that the restrictions which limited the exportations in foreign vessels of goods exported from the British West Indies and American colonies, to a direct exportation to the country to which such vessel did belong, is so far repealed as that such exportations in such vessels may be made to any country whatever, Great Britain and its dependencies not excepted.

"But it would seem that that repeal took place from the 5th of July, 1826 only; and Mr. Canning having stated that it had taken place from the 5th of January, 1826, I have addressed a private letter to Mr. Planta, acting Secretary of State during Mr. Canning's absence, asking an explanation of that apparent discrepancy, to which, however, not much importance can be attached.

"From the tenor of your instructions of the 19th of June and 8th of August, 1826, it appears that even to the last date you were under an impression that both of the limitations of the act of Parliament of 24th of June, 1822, on the indirect or circuitous intercourse with the British colonies, were still in force; this, considering the manner in which the repeal of the limitation in question has been effected, is not a matter of surprise; and there was another circumstance calculated to strengthen that opinion.

"It appears, from your instruction of the 19th of June last, that the two acts of Parliament on that subject which had reached you or attracted your notice, were the act of 5th of July, 1825, (6th Geo. 4th, ch. 114,) to regulate the trade of the British possessions abroad, and an act of 27th of June, 1825, (6th Geo. 4th, ch. 73,) entitled 'An act for the further regulating the trade of his Majesty's possessions in America and the West Indies, and for the warehousing of goods therein.' By the sixth section of the last mentioned act the permission to export in foreign vessels goods from any of the British colonial free ports to any foreign country, taken in the most extensive sense of which it is susceptible, applies only to countries in Europe, Africa, or Asia, within the Mediterranean Sea, and to ships belonging to such countries. It does not extend to America, and does not embrace American ships. And it was, therefore, a natural inference that the 4th section of the act of 5th of July, 1825, (6th Geo. 4th, ch. 114,) when stating that foreign ships were permitted to export goods from the British possessions abroad to any foreign country whatever, referred to the last mentioned sixth section of the act of 27th of June, 1825, and had no reference to American ships. It is proper here to add, that this act of 27th of June, 1825, has since been repealed, not by the act abovementioned, of 5th of July, 1825, (6th Geo. 4th, 105,) 'to repeal the several laws relating to the customs,' but by a subsequent act of 26th of May, 1826, (7th Geo. 4th, ch. 48.)

"It seems to me that the intricacy of these several acts of Parliament, and the difficulty of understanding their precise meaning, might have been considered by the Government of Great Britain as a sufficient reason why that of the United states might not have been disposed to accept the conditions on which, by those acts, the intercourse was opened with the British colonies, without having previously, at least, come to an understanding of their true intent and meaning. In point of fact, it was understood by the American Government that one of those conditions was a prohibition to export goods in American vessels from those colonies to any other country than the United States."

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, December 19, 1826.

Ordered, That the Clerk cause to be printed the acts of the Parliament of Great Britain of June 24, 1822, June 27, 1825, the two acts of July 5, 1825, the act of May, 1826, the orders in council, dated July 27, 1826, relating to the trade between the United States and the British colonies.

CAP. XLIV.

AN ACT to regulate the trade between his Majesty's possessions in America and the West Indies, and other places in America and the West Indies.—June 24, 1822.

"Whereas divers acts of Parliament have been, from time to time, passed for regulating the importation and exportation of certain articles into and from certain territories, islands, and ports, under the dominion of his Majesty, in America and the West Indies, and it is expedient that the said several acts should be repealed, and other provisions made in lieu thereof:" Sec. c. 119. § 5. post.

Acts regulating the importation and exportation of certain articles into and from certain colonies in America and the West Indies herein recited, repealed, viz:

Be it therefore enacted by the King's most excellent Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Lords spiritual and temporal and Commons, in this present Parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same, That from and after the passing of this act, an act passed

28 G. 3, c. 6. in the twenty-eighth year of the reign of his late Majesty King George the Third, entitled "An act for regulating the trade between the subjects of his Majesty's colonies and plantations in North America and in the West India islands and the countries belonging to the United States of America, and between his Majesty's said subjects and the foreign

28 G. 3, c. 39. islands in the West Indies;" also, an act passed in the twenty-eighth year of the reign of his late Majesty King George the Third, entitled "An act to allow the importation of rum and other spirits from his Majesty's colonies or plantations in the West Indies into the province of Quebec without payment of duty, under certain conditions and restrictions;"

29 G. 3, c. 16. also, an act passed in the twenty-ninth year of the reign of his said late Majesty, entitled "An act to enable his Majesty to authorize, in case of necessity, the importation of bread, flour, Indian corn, and live stock, from any of the territories belonging to the United States of America, into the province of Quebec and all the countries bordering on the Gulf of Saint Lawrence, and the islands within the said Gulf, and to the coast of Labrador;"

29 G. 3, c. 56. also, another act passed in the twenty-ninth year of the reign of his said late Majesty, entitled "An act for explaining and amending an act passed in the last session of Parliament, entitled 'An act to regulate the trade between the subjects of his Majesty's colonies and plantations in North America and in the West India islands and the countries belonging to the United States of America, and between his Majesty's said subjects and

30 G. 3, c. 8. the foreign islands in the West Indies;'" also, an act passed in the thirtieth year of the reign of his said late Majesty, entitled "An act to amend two acts made in the twenty-eighth year of the reign of his present Majesty, the one entitled 'An act for regulating trade between the subjects of his Majesty's colonies and plantations in North America and in the West India islands and the countries belonging to the United States of America, and between his Majesty's said subjects and the foreign islands in the West Indies;' and the other entitled 'An act to allow the importation of rum or other spirits from his Majesty's colonies or plantations in the West Indies into the province of Quebec without payment of duty, under certain conditions and restrictions;'" also, an act passed

31 G. 3, c. 38. in the thirty-first year of the reign of his said late Majesty, entitled "An act to amend an act made in the twenty-eighth year of his present Majesty's reign for regulating the trade between the subjects of his Majesty's colonies and plantations in North America and in the West India islands and the countries belonging to the United States of America, and between his Majesty's said subjects and the foreign islands in the West Indies;" and also an act made in the twenty-seventh year of his present Majesty's reign for allowing the importation and exportation of certain goods, wares, and merchandise, in the ports of Kingston, Savannah la Mar, Montego Bay and Santa Lucia, in the island of Jamaica, in the port of Saint George, in the island of Grenada, in the port of Rosea, in the island of Dominica, and in the port of Nassau, in the island of New Providence, one of the Bahama

33 G. 3, c. 50. islands, under certain regulations and restrictions; also, an act passed in the thirty-third year of the reign of his said late Majesty, entitled "An act to amend an act passed in the twenty-seventh year of his present Majesty's reign for allowing the importation and exportation of certain goods, wares, and merchandise, in foreign ships, into and from certain ports and places in the West Indies; and for amending so much of an act made in the thirty-second year of the reign of his present Majesty as relates to permitting the importation of sugar in the Bahama and Bermuda islands in foreign ships; and so much of two acts, made in the twenty-eighth and thirty-first years of his present Majesty's reign, as prohibits the importation of timber into any island under the dominion of his Majesty in the West Indies from any foreign colony or plantation in the West Indies or South America; and so much of the said act, made in the twenty-eighth year of his present Majesty's reign, as prohibits the importation of pitch, tar, and turpentine into Nova Scotia or New Brunswick from any country belonging to the United States of America;"

44 G. 3, c. 101. also, an act passed in the forty-fourth year of the reign of his said late Majesty, entitled "An act for permitting, until the first day of August, one thousand eight hundred and seven, the exportation of salt from the port of Nassau, in the island of New Providence, the port of Exuma, and the port of Crooked island, in the Bahama islands, in ships belonging to the inhabitants of the United States of America, and coming in ballast;" also, an

45 G. 3, c. 57. act passed in the forty-fifth year of the reign of his said late Majesty, entitled "An act to consolidate and extend the several laws now in force for allowing the importation and exportation of certain goods and merchandise into and from certain ports in the West

53 G. 3, c. 37. encouraging the exportation of salt from the said islands;" also, an act passed in the fifty-third year of the reign of his said late Majesty, entitled "An act to amend an act of the twenty-eighth year of his present Majesty for allowing the importation of rum or other spirits from his Majesty's colonies or plantations in the West Indies into the province of Quebec without payment of duty;" also, another act passed in the fifty-third year of the reign of his said late Majesty, entitled "An act for further allowing the importation and exportation of certain articles at the island of Bermuda;" also, an act passed in the fifty-fourth year of the reign of his said late Majesty, entitled "An act to revive and make perpetual certain acts for consolidating and extending the several laws in force for allowing the importation and exportation of certain articles into and from certain ports in the West Indies;" also, an act passed in the fifty-seventh year of the reign of his said late Majesty, entitled "An act to extend the powers of two acts for allowing British plantation sugar and coffee and other articles, imported into Bermuda in British ships, to be exported to America in foreign vessels, and to permit articles the produce of America to be imported into the said island in foreign ships to certain other articles;" also, another act passed in the said fifty-seventh year of the reign of his said late Majesty, entitled "An act to extend several acts for allowing the importation and exportation of certain goods and merchandise to Porta Maria, in the island of Jamaica, and to the port of Bridge Town, in the island of Barbadoes;" also, an act passed in the fifty-eighth year of the reign of his said late Majesty, entitled "An act to allow for three years, and until six weeks after the commencement of the then next session of Parliament, the importation into ports specially appointed by his Majesty, within the provinces of Nova scotia and New Brunswick, of the articles therein enumerated, and the re-exportation thereof from such ports;" also, an act passed in the said fifty-eighth year of the reign of his late Majesty, entitled "An act to permit the importation of certain articles into his Majesty's colonies or plantations in the West Indies or on the continent of South America, and also certain articles into certain ports in the West Indies;" also, an act passed in the fifty-ninth year of the reign of his said late Majesty, entitled "An act to make perpetual an act of the forty-fourth year of his present Majesty for permitting the exportation of salt from the port of Nassau, in the island of New Providence, the port of Exuma, and the port of Crooked Island, in the Bahama islands, in American ships coming in ballast;" also, an act passed in the fifty-ninth year of the reign of his said late Majesty, entitled "An act to extend the provisions of three acts of the fifty-second, fifty-third, and fifty seventh years of his present Majesty, for allowing British plantation sugar and coffee and other articles, imported into Bermuda in British ships, to be exported to America in foreign vessels, and to permit articles the produce of America to be imported into Bermuda in foreign ships to certain other articles;" also, an act passed in the first year of the reign of his present Majesty, entitled "An act to extend several acts for allowing the importation and exportation of certain goods and merchandises to Morant Bay, in the island of Jamaica;" also, another act passed in the first year of his present Majesty's reign, entitled "An act to permit the importation of coffee from any foreign colony or plantation in America into the port of Bridge Town, in Barbadoes;" also, an act passed in the first and second years of the reign of his present Majesty, entitled "An act to make perpetual an act of the fifty-eighth year of his late Majesty to allow the importation into certain ports in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick of certain enumerated articles, and the re-exportation thereof from such ports," shall be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

53 G. 3, c. 50. 54 G. 3, c. 48. 57 G. 3. c. 28. 57 G. 3, c. 74. 58 G. 3, c. 19. 58 G. 3, c. 27. 59 G. 3, c. 18. 59 G. 3, c. 55. 1 G. 4, c. 12. 1 G. 4, c. 32. 1 and 2 G. 4, c. 7.

II. Provided also, and be it further enacted, That nothing in this act contained shall extend or be deemed, or construed to extend, to release or discharge any seizure of goods, wares, and merchandise, or of any ship or vessel, or to release or discharge any forfeiture or penalty incurred on or before the passing of this act, but that the same may be prosecuted, sued for, recovered, and divided in such and the like manner as any such seizure, forfeiture, or penalty might have been prosecuted, sued for, recovered, and divided, if this act had not been made.

Proviso for seizures, forfeitures and penalties already incurred.

III. And be it further enacted, That from and after the passing of this act it shall be lawful to import into any of the ports enumerated in the schedule annexed to this act, marked A, from any foreign country on the continent of North or South America, or from any foreign island in the West Indies, whether such country or island as aforesaid shall be under the dominion of any foreign European Sovereign or State, or otherwise, the articles enumerated in the schedule annexed to this act, marked B, either in British built ships or vessels owned and navigated according to law, or in any ship or vessel bona fide the build of and owned by the inhabitants of any country or place belonging to or under the dominion of the Sovereign or State of which the said articles are the growth, produce, or manufacture, such ship or vessel being navigated with a master and three-fourths of the mariners, at least, belonging to such country or place; or in any British built ship or vessel which has been sold to and become the property of the subjects of any such Sovereign or State, such ship or vessel last mentioned being also navigated with a master and three-fourths of the mariners, at least, belonging to such country or place: Provided always, That no articles enumerated in the said schedule shall be imported in any foreign ship or vessel, or in any British built ship or vessel so sold as aforesaid, unless shipped and brought directly from the country or place of which they are the growth, produce, or manufacture.

Articles in schedule B may be imported from North or South America or West Indies under dominion of European Sovereign, &c., into ports in schedule A either in British vessels or vessels of the country.

IV. And be it further enacted, That it shall be lawful to export in any British built ship or vessel owned and navigated according to law, or in any foreign ship or vessel, as aforesaid, or in any British built ship or vessel so sold as aforesaid, from any of the ports enumerated in the schedule annexed to this act, marked A, any article of the growth, produce, or manufacture of any of his Majesty's dominions, or any other article legally imported into the said ports, provided that the said articles, when exported in any such foreign ship or vessel, or in any British built ship or vessel so sold as aforesaid, shall be exported direct to the country or State in America or the West Indies to which such ship or vessel belongs, as aforesaid; and before the shipment thereof, security by bond shall be given to his Majesty, his heirs and successors, in a penalty equal to half the value of the said articles; such bond to be entered into by the master and exporter before the Collector, or other chief officer of the customs of such colony, plantation, or Certain articles may be exported direct from ports in schedule A in such British or foreign vessels on certain conditions.

Bond by master and exporter for landing, &c.

island, for the due landing the said articles at the port or ports for which entered, and for producing a certificate thereof within twelve months from the date of such bond, under the hand and seal of the British Consul or Vice Consul resident at the port or place where the said articles shall have been landed; but in case there shall not be any such Consul or Vice Consul there resident, such certificate to be under the hand and seal of the chief magistrate, or under the hand and seal of two known British merchants residing at such port or place; but such bond may be discharged by proof, on oath, by credible persons that the said articles were taken by enemies or perished in the seas: Provided always, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to permit or allow the exportation of any arms or naval stores, unless a license shall have been obtained for that purpose from his Majesty's Secretary of State; and in case any such articles shall be shipped or waterborne for the purpose of being exported contrary to this act, the same shall be forfeited, and shall and may be seized and prosecuted as hereinafter directed.

No exportation of arms or naval stores without license.

Proviso for foreign vessels, though not of the build of the country.

V. Provided always, and be it further enacted, That, for ten years after the passing of this act, nothing in this act contained shall extend, or be construed to extend, to exclude from the trade allowed by this act any foreign ship or vessel which, previous to the passing of this act, may have been engaged in lawful trade with his Majesty's said colonies, islands, or plantations, on account of such ship or vessel not being of the build of the country to which such ship or vessel may belong.

Proof of legal importation before goods exported.

VI. And be it further enacted, That in case any doubt shall arise whether any goods, wares, or merchandise, intended to be exported in any foreign ship or vessel under the authority of this act, had been legally imported into such port, the legality of such importation shall be made to appear to the satisfaction of the Collector and Comptroller, or other principal officer of the customs of such port, before such goods, wares, and merchandise shall be suffered to be shipped for exportation.

On importation of articles into ports in schedule A, certain duties in schedule C to be paid for use of colonies.

VII. And be it further enacted, That from and after the passing of this act there shall be raised, levied, or collected, and paid unto his Majesty, his heirs and successors, upon the several articles enumerated or described in the said schedule marked C, imported or brought into any of the ports enumerated in the schedule marked A, from any such foreign island, State, or country, under the authority of this act, the several duties of customs, as the same are respectively inserted or described and set forth in figures in the said schedule annexed to this act, marked C, and the same shall be under the management of the Commissioners of the Customs in England, and shall be raised, levied, collected, paid, and recovered in such and the like manner and form, and by such and the like rules, ways, means, and methods, respectively, and under such penalities and forfeitures, as any other duties now payable to his Majesty on goods imported into any of the islands, plantations, colonies or territories belonging to or under the dominion of his Majesty in America or the West Indies, are or may be raised, levied, collected, paid, and recovered, by any act or acts of Parliament now in force, as fully and effectually, to all intents and purposes, as if the several clauses, powers, directions, penalities, and forfeitures relating thereto were particularly repeated and again enacted in the body of this act; and the produce of such duties shall be paid by the Collector of the Customs to the Treasurer or Receiver General of the colony, province, or plantation, in which the same shall be respectively levied, to be applied to such uses and purposes as may be directed by the authority of the respective general courts or general assemblies of such colonies, provinces, or plantations.

How recovered.

How duties applied in colonies having no general courts or assemblies.

VIII. And be it further enacted, That, in case there shall be no general courts or general assemblies in the colony, province, or plantation in which the said duties shall have been levied and collected under the authority of this act, the net proceeds of such duties shall then be applied and appropriated in such and the like manner, and to such uses as any other duties levied and collected in any of his Majesty's colonies, provinces, or plantations in America or the West Indies not having general courts or general assemblies, may now, by any act or acts of Parliament, passed in Great Britain or the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, or by any order of his Majesty in council, or by any proclamation issued in his Majesty's name, be appropriated and applied.

How value of articles subject to ad valorem duty ascertained.

IX. And be it further enacted, That in all cases where, by the schedule marked C, the duties imposed upon the importation of articles into his Majesty's colonies, plantations, or islands, in America or the West Indies, are charged, not according to the weight, gauge, or measure, but according to the value thereof, and such value shall be ascertained by the declaration of the importer or proprietor of such articles, or his known agent or factor, in manner and form following, that is to say:

"I, A. B., do hereby declare that the articles mentioned in the entry, and contained in the packages, [here specifying the several packages, and describing the several marks and numbers as the case may be,] are of the value of ———.

"Witness my hand, the —— day of ———.

ported; and such invoice price, with the addition of ten pounds per centum thereon, shall be deemed and taken to be the value of the articles in such colony, plantation, or island, as aforesaid, in lieu of the value so declared by the importer or proprietor, or his known agent or factor, and upon which the duties specified in the said schedule shall be charged and paid: Provided also, That if it shall appear to the Collector or other chief officer of the customs that such articles have been invoiced below the real and true value thereof at the place from whence the same were imported, or if the invoice price is not known, the articles shall, in such case, be examined by two competent persons, to be nominated and appointed by the Governor or Commander-in-chief of the colony, plantation, or island into which the said articles are imported; and such person shall declare, on oath, before the Collector or chief officer of the customs, what is the true and real value of such articles in such colony, plantation, or island; and the value so declared on the oaths of such persons shall be deemed to be the true and real value of such articles, and upon which the duties specified in the said schedule marked C shall be charged and paid. [The value of goods subject to ad valorem duty ascertained as by this section.—See Cap. 119, § 5, post.

Proviso where value or invoice price not known.

What deemed the true value.

X. And be it further enacted, That if the importer or proprietor of such articles shall refuse to pay the duties hereby imposed thereon, it shall and may be lawful for the Collector or other chief officer of the customs where such articles shall be imported, and he is hereby respectively required, to take and secure the same, with the casks or other package thereof, and to cause the same to be publicly sold, within the space of twenty days, at the most, after such refusal made, and at such time and place as such officer shall, by four or more days' public notice, appoint for that purpose, which articles shall be sold to the best bidder; and the money arising by the sale thereof shall be applied, in the first place, in payment of the said duties, together with the charges that shall have been occasioned by the said sale; and the overplus, if any, shall be paid to such importer or proprietor, or any other person authorized to receive the same.

Importer refusing to pay duties, articles to be sold, &c.

Application of produce.

XI. And be it further enacted, That whenever any foreign article is liable to duty by this act, on the importation thereof into any of his Majesty's colonies, plantations, or islands in America or the West Indies, under the provisions of this act, the like duty shall be payable upon any such foreign article† when imported into any such colonies, plantations, or islands direct from any part of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland; and such duty shall be raised, levied, collected, and paid, in such and the like manner, and be appropriated and applied to such and the like uses, as the duty payable upon the like article imported from any other place under the provisions of this act is by this act directed to be raised and applied.

Foreign articles charged with duty on importation from place of growth, to pay as on importation direct from United Kingdom.

†Sic.

Duties not payable if articles liable to equal colonial duty.

XII. Provided always, and be it further enacted, That if, upon the importation of any article charged with duty by this act, the said article shall also be liable to the payment of duty under the authority of any colonial law equal to, or exceeding in amount, the duty charged by this act, then, and in such case, the duty charged upon such article by this act shall not be demanded or paid upon the importation of such article: Provided, also, That if the duty payable under such colonial law shall be less in amount than the duty payable by this act, then, and in such case, the difference only in the amount of the duty payable by this act, and the duty payable under the authority of such colonial law, shall be deemed to be the duty payable by this act; and the same shall be collected and paid in such and the like manner, and appropriated and applied to such and the like uses, as the duties specified in the said schedule annexed to this act, marked C, are directed to be collected, paid, appropriated, and applied.

If colonial duty less, difference only paid.

XIII. And be it further enacted, That all sums of money granted and imposed by this act as duties shall be deemed, and are hereby declared to be, sterling money of Great Britain, and shall be collected, recovered, and paid, to the amount of the value which such nominal sums bear in Great Britain; and that such moneys may be received and taken according to the proportion and value of five shillings and sixpence the ounce in silver.

Duties to be sterling money at a certain rate.

XIV. And be it further enacted, That any article enumerated in the schedule B, legally imported as aforesaid under the authority of this act, shall be allowed to be exported in any British ship or vessel, owned and navigated according to law, to any other British island, colony, or plantation in America or the West Indies, provided that, upon the importation thereof into any such other British island, colony, or plantation, proof shall be produced that the said duties, due to his Majesty, have been first paid in the colony or plantation into which the said articles shall have been first imported; and any article so imported in any ship or vessel as aforesaid shall be allowed to be exported to any part of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, under the rules, regulations restrictions, securities, penalties, and forfeitures, particularly mentioned and provided in an act of Parliament, made in the twelfth year of the reign of King Charles II, entitled "An act for the encouraging and increasing of shipping and navigation;" and in another act of Parliament, made in the twenty-second and twenty-third years of the reign of King Charles II, entitled "An act to prevent the planting of tobacco in England, and for regulating the plantation trade;" and in another act of Parliament, made in the twentieth year of his late Majesty's reign, entitled "An act to allow the trade between Ireland and the British colonies in America and the West Indies, and the British settlements on the coast of Africa, to be carried on in like manner as it is now carried on between Great Britain and the said colonies and settlements," or in any of the said acts with respect to the goods, wares, or merchandise therein enumerated or described.

Articles in schedule B may be exported to any other British colony, or to United Kingdom.

22 and 23 Car. 2, c. 26.

20 G. 3, c. 10.

"XV. And whereas it is the intention and meaning of this act that the privileges hereby granted to foreign ships and vessels shall be confined to the ships and vessels of such countries only as give the like privileges to British ships and vessels in their ports in America and the West Indies:" Be it therefore enacted, That it shall be lawful for his Majesty, his heirs and successors, by order in council, from time to time, when and as often as the same shall be judged expedient, to prohibit trade and intercourse, under the authority of this act, with any country or island in America or the West Indies, if it

His Majesty may prohibit intercourse with any country where it shall appear that the privileges granted by this act to foreign vessels are not allowed to British vessels trading with such country, &c.

shall appear to his Majesty that the privileges granted by this act to foreign ships and vessels are not allowed to British ships and vessels trading to and from any such country or island under the provisions of this act; and in case such order of his Majesty in council shall be issued, then, during the time that such order in council shall be in force, none of the provisions of this act, either as respects the laws herein repealed or to any other provisions of this act, shall apply or be taken to apply to any country or State, the trade with which, under the provisions of this act, shall be prohibited by any such order of his Majesty in council; and if any goods whatever shall be imported from, or shipped for the purpose of being exported to, any such country or island in America or the West Indies in any foreign ship or vessel, after trade and intercourse therewith shall have been prohibited by any such order of his Majesty in council issued under the authority of this act, all such goods, together with the ship or vessel in which the same shall have been imported, or in which the same shall have been shipped for the purpose of being exported as aforesaid, shall be forfeited, with all her guns, furniture, ammunition, tackle, and apparel; and in every such case the same shall and may be seized by any officer of his Majesty's customs or Navy authorized or empowered to make seizures in cases of forfeiture, and shall and may be prosecuted in manner as hereinafter directed.

Seizure made, in what case.

His Majesty may extend this act to other ports than those enumerated in schedules.

XVI. And be it further enacted, That if his Majesty shall deem it expedient to extend the provisions of this act to any port or ports not enumerated in the schedule marked A, it shall be lawful for his Majesty, by order in council, to extend the provisions of this act to such port or ports; and from and after the day mentioned in such order in council all the privileges and advantages of this act, and all the provisions, penalties, and forfeitures therein contained shall extend, and be deemed and construed to extend, to any such port or ports, respectively, as fully as if the same had been inserted and enumerated in the said schedule at the time of passing this act.

No articles except such as are in schedule B to be imported.

Penalty.

XVII. And be it further enacted, That no articles, except such as are enumerated in the schedule marked B, shall be imported in any such British built ship or vessel, or in any such foreign ship or vessel, or in any British built ship or vessel so sold as aforesaid, from any foreign country or State on the continent of America or island in the West Indies, into any of the ports enumerated in the schedule marked A, or into any port which may be added to the schedule marked A, by virtue of any order in council as aforesaid, on any pretence whatever, on pain of forfeiting such articles, together with the ship or vessel in which the same shall have been imported, and the guns, tackle, apparel, and furniture of such ship or vessel; and in every such case the same shall and may be seized by any officer or officers of his Majesty's customs or Navy who are or shall be authorized and empowered to make seizures in cases of forfeiture, and shall and may be prosecuted in such manner as hereinafter directed.

No articles to be imported or exported, except from or to ports mentioned in schedule A.

XVIII. And be it further enacted, That no articles whatever shall be imported or exported, either in a British built ship or vessel, or in any such foreign ship or vessel as aforesaid, from or to any foreign country on the continent of North or South America, or from or to any foreign island in the West Indies, into or from any port of any British colony, plantation, or island in America or the West Indies not enumerated in the schedule annexed to this act, marked A, on any pretence whatever, on forfeiture of such articles, as also the ship or vessel in which the same shall be imported, with all her guns, furniture, ammunition, tackle, and apparel.

Proviso for right of exporting in British ships produce of fisheries.

XIX. Provided always, and be it further enacted, That nothing in this act contained shall affect, or be construed to affect, the right which British subjects or others may enjoy under any law in force at the passing of this act, of exporting in British ships, from ports not enumerated in the said schedule marked A, the produce of the fisheries carried on from any of his Majesty's said colonies, plantations, or islands.

How penalties and forfeitures recovered.

XX. And be it further enacted, That all penalties and forfeitures imposed by this act shall and may be respectively prosecuted, sued for, and recovered, and divided in Great Britain, Guernsey, Jersey, or the Isle of Man, or in any of his Majesty's colonies or islands in America, in the same manner and form, and by the same rules and regulations, in all respects, in so far as the same are applicable, as any other penalties and forfeitures imposed by any act or acts of Parliament made for the security of the revenue of the customs, or for the regulation or improvement thereof, or for the regulation of trade or navigation, and which were in force immediately before the passing of this act, may be respectively prosecuted, sued for, recovered, and divided in Great Britain, Guernsey, Jersey, or the Isle of Man, or in any of his Majesty's colonies or islands in America.

CHAPTER LXXIII.

AN ACT for further regulating the trade of his Majesty's possessions in America and the West Indies, and for the warehousing of goods therein.—June 27, 1825.

Whereas an act was passed in the third year of the reign of his present Majesty, entitled "An act to regulate the trade between his Majesty's possessions in America and other places in America and the West Indies," whereby it is enacted that it shall be lawful to import into any of the ports in his Majesty's said possessions enumerated in a schedule to the said act annexed, (marked A,) and therein denominated "free ports," from any foreign country on the continent of North or South America, or from any foreign island in the West Indies, the articles enumerated in another schedule to the said act annexed, (marked B,) subject, nevertheless, to the several duties of customs set forth in another schedule to the said act annexed, (marked C,) and that it shall be lawful so to import the same in certain foreign ships or vessels therein mentioned, as well as in British ships or vessels; and whereas another act was passed in the said third year of the reign of his present Majesty, entitled "An act to regulate the trade between his Majesty's possessions in America and the West Indies, and other parts of the world," whereby it is enacted that it shall be lawful to import in any British ship or vessel owned and navigated according to law, from any port in Europe or Africa, or from Gibraltar, the island of Malta, or the dependencies thereof, or the islands of Guernsey, Jersey, Alderney, or Sark, into any of his Majesty's colonies, plantations, or islands in America or the West Indies, the articles enumerated or described in a schedule thereunto annexed, (marked A,) subject, nevertheless, on importation, to certain duties of customs set forth in another schedule thereunto annexed, (marked B;) and whereas it is expedient to permit all goods (except as hereinafter excepted) to be imported from any of the said places into any of the said free ports, and to charge the same with the like duties from whichever of the said places the same may be imported, and also to permit any of such goods to be so imported in ships of the country of which the goods are the produce, as well as in British ships, but to confine all such importations to the said free ports:

3 G. 4, c. 44. Intercourse with America.

3 G. 4, c. 45. Intercourse with Europe.

Certain schedules of goods and of duties imposed by recited acts, or by 4 G. 4, c. 2, repealed;

Be it therefore enacted, by the King's most excellent Majesty, by and with the advice of the Lords spiritual and temporal, and Commons, in his present Parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same, That the several schedules (marked B and C respectively) to the first recited act annexed, and the several schedules (marked A and B respectively) to the second recited act annexed, and also that all duties imposed by either of the said acts, or by an act passed in the fourth year of his said Majesty's reign, entitled "An act to amend an act of the last session of Parliament for regulating the trade between his Majesty's possessions in America and the West Indies and other parts of the world," shall, from and after the fifth day of January, one thousand eight hundred and twenty-six, be repealed, and the same are hereby repealed accordingly, except so far as the same relate in any way to the island of Newfoundland.

except as to Newfoundland.

All goods may be imported from America, Europe, or Africa, &c.;

II. And be it further enacted, That from and after the fifth day of January, one thousand eight hundred and twenty-six, it shall be lawful to import into any of the said free ports, except in Newfoundland, any goods (except as hereinafter excepted) from any foreign place in America, or in Europe, or in Asia, within the Mediterranean Sea, and from any place in Africa, and from Gibraltar, and from the islands of Malta, Guernsey, Jersey, Alderney, and Sark, provided such importations be made in British ships, or in ships of the country of which the goods are the produce, subject, nevertheless, to the powers given to his Majesty by an act passed in the fourth year of his reign, entitled "An act to authorize his Majesty, under certain circumstances, to regulate the duties and drawbacks on goods imported or exported in foreign vessels, and to exempt certain foreign vessels from pilotage;" and by another act passed in the fifth year of his reign to amend the same: Provided always, That nothing in this act contained shall extend to permit the importation of gunpowder, arms, ammunition, or utensils of war, dried or salted fish, salted beef, pork, or bacon, whale oil, blubber or fins, books which are prohibited to be imported into the United Kingdom, base or counterfeit coin, or any goods the produce or manufacture of any place within the limits of the East India Company's charter, into any of his Majesty's possessions in America or the West Indies, nor coffee, cocoa-nuts, sugar, molasses, or rum of foreign production, into any of the said possessions in South America or the West Indies, or into Newfoundland.

subject to powers in acts 4 G. 4, c. 77, and 5 G. 4, c. 50.

Articles prohibited.

Foreign coffee, &c., may be imported into North America.

III. And be it further enacted, That it shall be lawful to import any coffee, cocoa-nuts, sugar, molasses, and rum of foreign production, into any of the British possessions in North America, except Newfoundland, anything in any act or acts to the contrary notwithstanding: Provided always, That all coffee, cocoa-nuts, sugar, molasses, and rum, (although the same may be of the British plantations,) having been imported into any of the British possessions in North America, except Newfoundland, shall, upon subsequent importation from thence into any of the British possessions in South America or the West Indies, or into Newfoundland, or into the United Kingdom, be deemed to be of foreign production, and shall be liable on such importations, respectively, to the same duties or the same forfeitures as articles of the like description, being of foreign production, would be liable to, unless the same shall have been warehoused under the provisions of this act, and exported from the warehouse direct to such other British possession, or to Newfoundland, or to the United Kingdom, as the case may be.

New duties according to the schedule.

IV. And be it further enacted, That, from and after the fifth day of January, one thousand eight hundred and twenty-six, in lieu of the duties hereby made to cease and determine, there shall be raised, levied, collected, and paid unto his Majesty, his heirs and successors, upon importation of the several articles enumerated or described in the schedule of duties to this act annexed, into any of the said possessions in America or the West Indies, except Newfoundland, from any foreign place in America, or from Europe, or from Asia, within the Mediterranean Sea, or from any place in Africa, the several duties of customs as the same are respectively set forth in figures in the said schedule:

Abating the amount of any previous duties.

Provided always, That no greater proportion of such duties shall be charged upon any article subject also to duty under any other act heretofore and still in force, or under any colonial law, than the amount, if any, by which the duty charged by this act shall exceed such other duty or duties.

Duties to be levied under powers of former acts.

V. And be it further enacted, That the duties imposed by this act shall be levied, raised, applied, and abated, under the same management, and in the same manner, and by the same powers and means, and under the like penalties and forfeitures, as the duties imposed by the two acts hereinbefore first mentioned would be levied, raised, applied, and abated under the provisions of those acts, respectively, except so far as the same may be altered by this act.

Exportation to Europe, &c., in ships of the place of destination.

VI. And be it further enacted, That it shall be lawful to export from any of the said free ports, except in Newfoundland, to any foreign country in Europe or Africa, or in Asia, within the Mediterranean Sea, in any ship belonging to such country, any goods, being of the growth, production, or manufacture of such possessions, and any goods which have been legally imported into the same.

Power to prohibit trade with countries not granting similar privileges.

VII. And be it further enacted, That it shall be lawful for his Majesty, his heirs and successors, by order in council, from time to time, when and as often as it shall be judged expedient, to prohibit the trade and intercourse authorized by this act with any country in Europe having possessions in America or the West Indies, if it shall appear that the privileges granted by this act to foreign ships or vessels are not allowed by such country to British ships or vessels in trade or intercourse with the possessions of such country in America or the West Indies.

4 G. 4, c. 24, as relates to goods in schedule B, warehoused and exported to British possessions in America, repealed.

VIII. And be it further enacted, That so much of an act passed in the fourth year of the reign of his present Majesty, entitled "An act to make more effectual provision for permitting goods imported to be secured in warehouses or other places without payment of duty on the first entry thereof," as enacts that certain goods and merchandise, mentioned in a schedule (marked B) to that act annexed, warehoused under the provisions of that act, shall not be exported from the warehouse to any British colony, plantation, territory, or dominion in America or the West Indies, nor be imported into any such British colony or plantation, unless, and until all duties as well of customs as excise, payable in Great Britain or Ireland respectively, on such goods and merchandise, for home consumption, shall have been paid, shall be repealed, and the same is hereby repealed accordingly.

Kingston, Halifax, and Quebec, &c., to be free warehousing ports; and such other ports as his Majesty shall appoint.

IX. And whereas it is expedient to constitute and appoint some of the free ports in America and the West Indies to be free warehousing ports for all goods which may be legally imported into the said ports respectively; and it is also expedient to empower his Majesty to constitute and appoint, from time to time, any other ports in any of the said British possessions in America or the West Indies, to be, in like manner, free warehousing ports for such goods as may be legally imported into such ports respectively; and it is therefore necessary to make regulations for the appointing of proper warehouses at such ports, and for the lodging and securing of goods therein: Be it therefore enacted, That the several ports hereinafter mentioned, (that is to say,) Kingston, in the island of Jamaica, Halifax, in Nova Scotia, Quebec, in Canada, Saint John's, in New Brunswick, and Bridge Town, in the island of Barbadoes, shall be free warehousing ports for the purposes of this act; and that it shall be lawful for the several Collectors and Controllers of the said ports, respectively, by notice in writing under their hands, to appoint, from time to time, such warehouses at such ports, respectively, as shall be approved of by them, for the free warehousing and securing of goods therein for the purposes of this act, and also in such notice to declare what sorts of goods may be so warehoused, and, also, by like notice, to revoke or alter any such appointment or declaration: Provided always, That every such notice shall be transmitted to the Governor of the place, and shall be published in such manner as he shall direct.

Collectors and controllers to appoint warehouses.

Goods may be warehoused without payment of duty.

X. And be it further enacted, That it shall be lawful for the importer of any such goods into the said ports to warehouse the same in the warehouses so appointed, without payment of any duty on the first entry thereof, subject, nevertheless, to the rules, regulations, restrictions, and conditions hereinafter contained.

Stowage of goods in warehouse.

Locking and opening warehouse.

Carrying goods to and from warehouse.

XI. And be it further enacted, That all goods so warehoused shall be stowed in such parts or divisions of the warehouse, and in such manner as the Collector and Controller shall direct; and that the warehouse shall be locked and secured in such manner, and shall be opened and visited only at such times, and in the presence of such officers, and under such rules and regulations, as the Collector and Controller shall direct; and that all such goods shall, after being landed upon importation, be carried to the warehouse, or shall, after being taken out of the warehouse for exportation, be carried to be shipped, under such rules and regulations as the Collector and Controller shall direct.

Bond upon entry of goods to be warehoused.

XII. And be it further enacted, That, upon the entry of any goods to be warehoused, the importer of such goods, instead of paying down the duties due thereon, shall give bond, with two sufficient sureties to be approved of by the Collector or Controller, in treble the duties payable on such goods, with condition for the safe depositing of such goods in the warehouse mentioned in such entry, and for the payment of all duties due upon such goods, or for the exportation thereof, according to the first account taken of such goods upon the landing of the same; and with further condition that no part thereof shall be taken out of such warehouse until cleared from thence, upon due entry and payment of duty, or upon due entry for exportation; and with further condition that the whole of such goods shall be so cleared from such warehouse, and the duties upon any deficiency of the quantity, according to such first accounts, shall be paid within two years from the date of the first entry thereof; and if, after such bond shall have been given, the goods, or any part thereof, shall be sold or disposed of, so that the original bonder shall be no longer interested in or have control over the same, it shall be lawful for the Collector and Controller to admit fresh security to be given by the bond of the new proprietor, or other person having control over such goods with his sufficient sureties, and to cancel the bond given by the original bonder of such goods, or to exonerate him to the extent of the fresh security so given.

Purchaser of goods may give bond in lieu of original bond.

Goods entered to be warehoused and not deposited, &c., to be forfeited.

XIII. And be it further enacted, That if any goods which have been entered to be warehoused shall not be duly carried and deposited in the warehouse, or shall afterwards be taken out of the warehouse without due entry and clearance, or, having been entered and cleared for exportation from the warehouse, shall not be duly carried and shipped, or shall afterwards be relanded, except with permission of the proper officer of the customs, such goods shall be forfeited.

Account of goods to be taken on landing.

No goods to be taken out of warehouse except on entry, &c.

XIV. And be it further enacted, That, upon the entry and landing of any goods to be warehoused, the proper officer of the customs shall take a particular account of the same, and shall mark the contents on each package, and shall enter the same in a book to be kept for that purpose; and no goods which have been so warehoused shall be taken or delivered from the warehouse, except upon due entry, and under care of the proper officers for exportation, or upon due entry and payment of duty for home use; and whenever the whole of the goods warehoused under any entry shall be cleared from the warehouse, or whenever further time shall be granted for any such goods to remain warehoused, an account shall be made out of the quantity upon which the duties have been paid, and of the quantity exported, and of the quantity (to be then ascertained) of the goods still remaining in the warehouse, as the case may be, deducting from the whole the quantity contained in any whole packages (if any) which may have been abandoned for the duties; and if upon such account there shall, in either case, appear to be any deficiency of the original quantity, the duty payable upon the amount of such deficiency shall then be paid.

Duties to be paid upon deficiencies.

Samples may be taken.

XV. And be it further enacted, That it shall be lawful for the Collector and Controller, under such regulations as they shall see fit, to permit moderate samples to be taken of any goods so warehoused, without entry and without payment of duty, except as the same shall eventually become payable as on a deficiency of the orginal quantity.

Goods may be sorted and repacked.

XVI. And be it further enacted, That it shall be lawful for the Collector and Controller, under such regulations as they shall see fit, to permit the proprietor, or other person having control over any goods so warehoused, to sort, separate, and pack, and repack any such goods, and to make such lawful alterations therein, or arrangements and assortments thereof, as may be necessary for the preservation of such goods, or in order to the sale, shipment, or legal disposal of the same; and also to permit any parts of such goods so separated to be destroyed, but without prejudice to the claim for duty upon the whole original quantity of such goods: Provided always, That it shall be lawful for any person to abandon any whole packages to the officers of the customs for the duties without being liable for any duty upon the same.

Whole packages may be abandoned for duty.

All goods to be cleared within two years or sold.

XVII. And be it further enacted, That all goods which have been so warehoused shall be duly cleared either for exportation or for home consumption within two years from the day of the first entry thereof; and if any such goods be not so cleared, it shall be lawful for the Collector and Controller to cause the same to be sold, and the produce shall be applied, first to the payment of the duties, next of warehouse rent and other charges, and the overplus (if any) shall be paid to the proprietor: Provided always, That it shall be lawful for the Collector and Controller to grant further time for any such goods to remain warehoused, if they shall see fit so to do.

Further time may be granted.

Bond on entry for exportation.

XVIII. And be it further enacted, That upon the entry outwards of any goods to be exported from the warehouse, the person entering the same shall give security by bond in treble the duties of importation on the quantity of such goods, with two sufficient sureties, to be approved by the Collector or Controller, that the same shall be landed at the place for which they be entered outwards, or be otherwise accounted for to the satisfaction of the Collector and Controller.

Power to appoint other free ports.

XIX. And be it further enacted, That it shall be lawful for his Majesty in council, from time to time, to appoint any port in his Majesty's possessions in America or the West Indies to be a free warehousing port for the purposes of this act; and every such port, so appointed by his Majesty, shall be a free warehousing port under this act, as if appointed by the same, in as full and ample a manner, in all respects, as any of the ports hereinbefore mentioned are free warehousing ports appointed by this act.

Not to affect the trade or fisheries of Newfoundland.

XX. And be it further enacted, That nothing in this act shall extend to alter or affect in any manner the regulations of the trade or fisheries of Newfoundland, or the duties or drawbacks payable or allowable therein, under any acts or act in force at the time of the commencement of this act.

Act may be amended this session.

XXI. And be it further enacted, That this act may be amended, altered, or repealed by any act to be passed in the present session of Parliament.

SCHEDULE OF DUTIES.

A schedule of duties payable upon goods, wares, and merchandise, not being of the growth, production, or manufacture of the United Kingdom, or of any of the British possessions in America or the West Indies, or within the limits of the East India Company's charter, imported into any of the British possessions in America or the West Indies.

CHAPTER CXIV.

AN ACT to regulate the trade of the British possessions abroad.—July 5, 1825.

6 Geo. 4, c. 105.

Whereas an act was passed in the present session of Parliament, entitled "An act to repeal the several laws relating to the customs," in which it is declared that the laws of the customs have become intricate by reason of the great number of acts relating thereto which have been passed through a long series of years; and it is therefore highly expedient, for the interests of commerce and the ends of justice, and also for affording convenience and facility to all persons who may be subject to the operation of those laws, or who may be authorized to act in the execution thereof, that all the statutes now in force relating to the customs should be repealed, and that the purposes for which they have, from time to time, been made should be secured by new enactments, exhibiting more perspicuously and compendiously the various provisions contained in them; and whereas by the said act all the laws of the customs relating to the trade of the British possessions abroad will be repealed; and it is expedient to make provisions for the future regulation of the trade of those possessions after such repeal shall have effect:

Commencement of this act.

Be it therefore enacted by the King's most excellent Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Lords spiritual and temporal, and Commons, in this present Parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same, That from and after the fifth day of January, one thousand eight hundred and twenty-six, this act shall come into and be and continue in full force and operation, for the regulating of the trade of the British possessions abroad.

Importation and exportation of goods confined to free ports.

II. And be it further enacted, That no goods shall be imported into, nor shall any goods, except the produce of the fisheries in British ships, be exported from any of the British possessions in America by sea, from or to any place other than the United Kingdom, or some other of such possessions, except into or from the several ports in such possessions, called "free ports," enumerated or described in the table following, that is to say:

Table of free ports.

Kingston, Savannah Le Mar, Montego Bay, Santa Lucia, Antonio, St. Ann, Falmouth, Maria, Morant Bay, Annotto Bay,	Jamaica.
Saint George, Grenada.
Roseau, Dominica.
Saint John's, Antigua.
San Josef, Trinidad.
Scarborough, Tobaga.
Road Harbor, Tortola.
Nassau, New Providence.
Pitt's Town, Crooked island.
Kingston, Saint Vincent.
Port St. George and Port Hamilton, Bermuda.
Any port where there is a custom-house, Bahamas.
Bridgetown, Barbadoes.
Saint John's, St. Andrew's, New Brunswick.
Halifax, Nova Scotia.
Quebec, Canada.
Saint John's, Newfoundland.
George Town, Demarara.
New Amsterdam, Berbice.
Castries, Saint Lucia.
Basseterre, Saint Kitts.
Charles Town, Nevis.
Plymouth, Montserrat.

His Majesty may extend the privileges of this act to other ports not herein emumerated.

III. Provided always, That, if his Majesty shall deem it expedient to extend the provisions of this act to any port or ports not enumerated in the said table, it shall be lawful for his Majesty, by order in council, to extend the provisions of this act to such port or ports; and from and after the day mentioned in such order in council, all the privileges and advantages of this act, and all the provisions, penalties, and forfeitures therein contained, shall extend, and be deemed and construed to extend, to any such port or ports, respectively, as fully as if the same had been inserted and enumerated in the said table at the time of passing this act: Provided, also, That nothing hereinbefore contained shall extend to prohibit the exportation of the produce of the fisheries from any ports or places in any of the said possessions in British ships, nor to prohibit the importation or exportation of goods into or from any ports or places in Newfoundland or Labrador in British ships.

Privileges granted to foreign ships limited to the ships of those countries which, having colonial possessions, shall grant the like privileges to British ships, &c.

IV. And whereas, by the law of navigation, foreign ships are permitted to import into any of the British possessions abroad, from the countries to which they belong, goods the produce of those countries, and to export goods from such possessions, to be carried to any foreign country whatever; and whereas it is expedient that such permission should be subject to certain conditions: Be it therefore enacted, That the privileges thereby granted to foreign ships shall be limited to the ships of those countries which, having colonial possessions, shall grant the like privileges of trading with those possessions to British ships, or which, not having colonial possessions, shall place the commerce and navigation of this country, and of its possessions abroad, upon the footing of the most favored nation, unless his Majesty, by his order in council, shall, in any case, deem it expedient to grant the whole or any of such privileges to the ships of any foreign country, although the conditions aforesaid shall not, in all respects, be fulfilled by such foreign country.

This act not to affect 4 G. 4, c. 77, and 5 G. 4, c. 50.

V. And be it further enacted, That nothing contained in this act, or any other act passed in the present session of Parliament, shall extend to repeal or in any way alter or affect an act passed in the fourth year of the reign of his present Majesty, entitled "An act to authorize his Majesty, under certain circumstances, to regulate the duties and drawbacks on goods imported or exported in foreign vessels, and to exempt certain foreign vessels from pilotage; nor to repeal or in any way alter or affect an act passed in the fifth year of the reign of his present Majesty, among other things, to amend the last mentioned act, and that all trade and intercourse between the British possessions and all foreign countries shall be subject to the powers granted to his Majesty by those acts."

Foreign ships trading between British possessions and other places in America to be deemed ships of the place to which they belong until June 24, 1832.

VI. Provided always, and be it further enacted, That, until the expiration of ten years, to be computed from the twenty-fourth day of June, one thousand eight hundred and twenty-two, every foreign ship which, previous to that day, had been engaged in trade between any of the British possessions in America and other places in America, shall, for the purposes of this act, be deemed to be a ship of the country or place to which she had then belonged, if still belonging thereto, anything in the law of navigation to the contrary notwithstanding.

Goods prohibited or restricted to be imported into colonies.

VII. And be it further enacted, That the several sorts of goods enumerated or described in the table following, denominated "a table of prohibitions and restrictions," are hereby prohibited to be imported or brought, either by sea, or by inland carriage, or navigation, into the British possessions in America, or into the island of Mauritius, or shall be so imported or brought only under the restrictions mentioned in such table, according as the several sorts of such goods are set forth therein, that is to say:

A table of prohibitions and restrictions.

Gunpowder, arms, ammunitions or utensils of war; beef, fresh or salted, except into Newfoundland; pork, except into Newfoundland; prohibited to be imported, except from the United Kingdom, or from some other British possession.

Tea, prohibited to be imported, except from the United Kingdom, or from some other British possession in America, unless by the East India Company, or with their license.

Fish, dried or salted; train oil, blubber, fins, or skins, the produce of creatures living in the sea, prohibited to be imported, except from the United Kingdom, or from some other British possession, or unless taken by British ships fitted out from the United Kingdom, or from some British possession, and brought in from the fishery, and except herrings from the Isle of Man, taken and cured by the inhabitants thereof.

Coffee, cocoa-nuts, sugar, molasses, rum, being of foreign production, or the production of any place within the limits of the East India Company's charter, except the island of Mauritius, prohibited to be imported into any of the British possessions on the continent of South America, or in the West Indies, except the Bahama and Bermuda islands, or into the island of Mauritius, and may also be prohibited to be imported into the Bahama or the Bermuda islands, by his Majesty's order in council.

Base or counterfeit coin, books, such as are prohibited to be imported into the United Kingdom, prohibited to be imported.

Goods imported contrary hereto, forfeited.

And if any goods shall be imported or brought into any of the British possessions in America, or into the island of Mauritius, contrary to any of the prohibitions or restrictions mentioned in such table, in respect of such goods, the same shall be forfeited.

Coffee, &c., though British, deemed foreign in certain cases.

VII. And be it further enacted, That all coffee, cocoa-nuts, sugar, molasses, and rum, (although the same may be of the British plantations,) imported into any of the British possessions in America, into which the like goods of foreign production can be legally imported, shall, upon subsequent importation from thence into any of the British possessions in America, into which such goods, being of foreign production, cannot be legally imported, or into the island of Mauritius, or into the United Kingdom, be deemed to be of foreign production, and shall be liable, on such importation, respectively, to the same duties, or the same forfeitures, as articles of the like description, being of foreign production, would be liable to, unless the same shall have been warehoused under the provisions of this act, and exported from the warehouse direct to such other British possessions, or to the island of Mauritius, or to the United Kingdom, as the case may be.

Duties of importation in America.

IX. And be it further enacted, That there shall be raised, levied, collected, and paid unto his Majesty the several duties of customs, as the same are respectively set forth in figures in the table of duties hereinafter contained, upon goods, wares, and merchandise imported or brought into any of his Majesty's possessions in America, that is to say:

Abatement of duty and remission of duty in certain cases.

And if any of the goods hereinbefore mentioned shall be imported through the United Kingdom, (having been warehoused therein, and exported from the warehouse, or the duties thereon, if then paid, having been drawn back,) one-tenth part of the duties herein imposed shall be remitted in respect of such goods; and if any of the goods hereinbefore mentioned shall be imported through the United Kingdom, (not from the warehouse,) but after all duties of importation for home use thereon shall have been paid thereon in the said United Kingdom, and not drawn back, such goods shall be free of all duties herein imposed.

Not to repeal act of 18 G. 3, c. 12;

X. And be it further enacted, That nothing in this act, or in any other act passed in the present session of Parliament, shall extend to repeal or abrogate, or in any way to alter or affect, an act passed in the eighteenth year of the reign of his late Majesty King George the Third, entitled "An act for removing all doubts and apprehensions concerning taxation by the Parliament of Great Britain in any of the colonies, provinces, and plantations in North America and the West Indies, and for repealing so much of an act made in the seventh year of the reign of his present Majesty as imposes a duty on tea imported from Great Britain into any colony or plantation in America as relates thereto," nor to repeal duties granted prior to that act;

nor to repeal, or in any way alter or affect, any act now in force which was passed prior to the last mentioned act, and by which any duties in any of the British possessions in America were granted, and still continue payable to the Crown;

nor to repeal 31 G. 3, c. 31.

nor to repeal, or in any way alter or affect, an act passed in the thirty-first year of the reign of his late Majesty King George the Third, entitled "An act to repeal certain parts of an act passed in the fourteenth year of his Majesty's reign, entitled 'An act for making more effectual provisions for the Government of the province of Quebec in North America, and to make further provisions for the Government of the said province.'"

Duties imposed by acts prior to act of 18 G. 3 to be applied to purposes of those acts.

XI. And be it further enacted, That the duties imposed by any of the acts hereinbefore mentioned or referred to, passed prior to the said act of the eighteenth year of his late Majesty's reign, shall be received, accounted for, and applied for the purposes of those acts: Provided always, That no greater proportion of the duties imposed by this act shall be charged upon any article which is subject also to duty, under any of the said acts, or subject also to duty under any colonial law, than the amount, if any, by which the duty charged by this act shall exceed such other duty or duties: Provided, nevertheless, That the full amount of the duties mentioned in this act, whether on account of such former acts, or on account of such colonial law, or on account of this act, shall be levied and recovered and received under the regulations, and by the means and powers of this act.

Currency, weights, and measures.

XII. And be it further enacted, That all sums of money granted or imposed by this act, either as duties, penalties, or forfeitures, in the British possessions in America, shall be deemed and are hereby declared to be sterling money of Great Britain, and shall be collected, recovered, and paid to the amount of the value which such nominal sums bear in Great Britain; and that such moneys may be received and taken according to the proportion and value of five shillings and sixpence the ounce in silver; and that all duties shall be paid and received in every part of the British possessions in America, according to British weights and measures in use at the time of passing of this act, and that in all cases where such duties are imposed according to any specific quantity, or any specific value, the same shall be deemed to apply in the same proportion to any greater or less quantity or value; and that all such duties shall be under the management of the Commissioners of the Customs.

Duties paid by Collector of Customs to Treasurer of colony in which levied.

XIII. And be it further enacted, That the produce of the duties so received by the means and powers of this act, except such duties as are payable to his Majesty under any act passed prior to the eighteenth year of his late Majesty as aforesaid, shall be paid by the Collector of the Customs into the hands of the Treasurer or Receiver General of the colony, or other proper officer authorized to receive the same, in the colony in which the same shall be levied, to be applied to such uses as shall be directed by the local Legislatures of such colonies respectively; and that the produce of such duties so received as aforesaid in the colonies which have no local Legislature shall and may be applied in such manner as shall be directed by the Commissioners of his Majesty's Treasury.

Drawback on rum, &c., of British possessions, exported from Newfoundland to Canada, &c.

XIV. And be it further enacted, That there shall be allowed upon the exportation from Newfoundland to Canada of rum or other spirits, being the produce of the British possessions in South America or the West Indies, a drawback of the full duties of customs which shall have been paid upon the importation thereof from any of the said places into Newfoundland; provided proof, on oath, be made to the satisfaction of the Collector and Controller of the Customs, at the port from whence such rum or other spirits shall be so exported, that the full duties on the importation of such rum or other spirits at the said port had been paid, and that a certificate be produced under the hands and seals of the Collector and Controller of the Customs at Quebec that such rum or other spirits had been duly landed in Canada: Provided always, That no drawback shall be allowed upon any such rum or other spirits unless the same shall be shipped within one year from the day of the importation of the same, nor unless such drawback shall be duly claimed within one year from the day of such shipment.

Limitation as to drawback.

Ship and cargo to be reported on arrival.

XV. And be it further enacted, That the master of every ship arriving in any of the British possessions in America, or the island of Mauritius, or the islands of Guernsey, Jersey, Alderney, or Sark, whether laden or in ballast, shall come directly, and before bulk be broken, to the custom-house for the port or district where he arrives, and there make a report, upon oath, in writing, to the Collector or Controller, or other proper officer, of the arrival and voyage of such ship, stating her name, country, and tonnage; and if British, the port of registry, the name and country of the master, the country of the owners, the number of the crew, and how many are of the country of such ship, and whether she be laden or in ballast; and if laden, the marks, numbers, and contents of every package and parcel of goods on board, and where the same was laden, and where and to whom consigned, and where any and what goods, if any, had been unladen during the voyage, as far as any of such particulars can be known to him; and the master shall further answer, upon oath, all such questions concerning the ship and the cargo, and the crew, and the voyage, as shall be demanded of him by such officer; and if any goods be unladen from any ship before such report be made, or if the master fail to make such report, or make an untrue report, or do not truly answer the questions demanded of him, he shall forfeit the sum of one hundred pounds; and if any goods be not reported, such goods shall be forfeited.

Particulars of report.

Penalty for false report.

Entry outwards of ship for cargo.

XIV. And be it further enacted, That the master of every ship bound from any British possession in America, or the island of Mauritius, or the islands of Guernsey, Jersey, Alderney, or Sark, shall, before any goods be laden therein, deliver to the Collector or Controller, or other proper officer, an entry outwards, under his hand, of the destination of such ship, stating her name, country, and tonnage; and if British, the port of registry, the name and country of the master, the country of the owners, the number of the crew, and how many are of the country of such ship; and if any goods be laden on board any ship before such entry be made, the master of such ship shall forfeit the sum of fifty pounds; and, before such ship depart, the master shall bring and deliver to the Collector or Controller, or other proper officer, a content, in writing, under his hand, of the goods laden, and the names of the respective shippers and consignees of the goods, with the marks and numbers of the packages or parcels of the same, and shall make oath to the truth of such content as far as any of such particulars can be known to him; and the master of every ship bound from any British possession in America, or from the island of Mauritius, or from the islands of Guernsey, Jersey, Alderney, or Sark, (whether in ballast or laden,) shall, before departure, come before the Collector or Controller, or other proper officer, and answer, upon oath, all such questions concerning the ship and the cargo, if any, and the crew, and the voyage, as shall be demanded of him by such officer; and thereupon the Collector and Controller, or other proper officer, if such ship be laden, shall make out and give to the master a certificate of the clearance of such ship for her intended voyage, containing an account of the total quantities of the several sorts of goods laden therein, or a certificate of her clearance in ballast, as the case may be; and if the ship shall depart without such clearance, or if the master shall deliver a false content, or shall not truly answer the questions demanded of him, he shall forfeit the sum of one hundred pounds.

Particulars of entry.

Penalty £50.

Content of the cargo to be delivered before departure.

Clearance of ship for the voyage.

Penalty for not clearing, £100.

Newfoundland fishing certificates in lieu of clearance during the fishing season.

XVII. Provided always, and be it further enacted, That whenever any ship shall be cleared out from any port in Newfoundland, or in any other part of his Majesty's dominions, for the fisheries on the banks or coasts of Newfoundland or Labrador, or dependencies thereof, without having on board any article of traffic, (except only such provisions, nets, tackle, and other things, as are usually employed in and about the said fishery, and for the conduct and carrying on of the same,) the master of any such ship shall be entitled to demand from the Collector, or other principal officer of the customs at such port, a certificate, under his hand, that such ship hath been specially cleared out for the Newfoundland fishery; and such certificate shall be in force for the fishing season of the year in which the same may be granted, and no longer; and upon the first arrival in any port in the said colony of Newfoundland or its dependencies of any ship having on board any such certificate as aforesaid, a report thereof shall be made by the master of such ship to the principal officer of the customs at such port; and all ships having such certificate, which has been so reported, and being actually engaged in the said fishery, or in carrying coastwise, to be landed or put on board any other ships engaged in the said fishery, any fish, oil, salt, provisions, or other necessaries, for the use and purposes thereof, shall be exempt from all obligation to make any entry at, or obtain any clearance from, any custom-house at Newfoundland upon arrival at, or departure from, any of the ports or harbors of the said colony or its dependencies during the continuance of the fishing season for which such certificate may have been granted; and previously to obtaining a clearance at the end of such season for any other voyage at any of such ports, the master of such ship shall deliver up the before mentioned certificate to the principal officer of the customs of such port: Provided always, That in case any such ship shall have on board, during the time the same may be engaged in the said fishery, any goods or merchandises whatsoever, other than fish, seals, oil made of fish or seals, salt, provisions, and other things, being the produce of or usually employed in the said fishery, such ship shall forfeit the said fishing certificate, and shall thenceforth become and be subject and liable to all such and the same rules, restrictions, and regulations, as ships in general are subject or liable to.

At the end of the season the certificate to be delivered up.

Ships trading to forfeit their certificate.

Entry of goods to be laden or unladen.

XVIII. And be it further enacted, That no goods shall be laden, or water-borne to be laden on board any ship, or unladen from any ship in any of the British possessions in America, or the island of Mauritius, or the islands of Guernsey, Jersey, Alderney, or Sark, until due entry shall have been made of such goods, and warrant granted for the lading or unlading of the same; and that no goods shall be so laden or water-borne, or so unladen, except at some place at which an officer of the customs is appointed to attend the lading and unlading of goods, or at some place at which a sufferance shall be granted by the Collector and Controller for the lading and unlading of such goods; and that no goods shall be so laden or unladen except in the presence or with the permission in writing of the proper officer: Provided always, That it shall be lawful for the Commissioners of his Majesty's Customs to make and appoint such other regulations for the carrying coastwise of any goods, or for the removing of any goods for shipment, as to them shall appear expedient; and that all goods laden, water-borne, or unladen, contrary to the regulations of this act, or contrary to any regulations so made and appointed, shall be forfeited.

Regulations inwards & outwards.

Regulations coastwise.

Forfeiture.

Particulars of entry of goods inwards and outwards.

XIX. And be it further enacted, That the persons entering any such goods shall deliver to the Collector or Controller, or other proper officer, a bill of the entry thereof, fairly written in words at length, containing the name of the exporter or importer, and of the ship, and of the master, and of the place to or from which bound, and of the place within the port where the goods are to be laden or unladen, and the particulars of the quality and quantity of the goods, and the packages containing the same, and the marks and numbers on the packages; and such persons shall, at the same time, pay down all duties due upon the goods, and the Collector and Controller, or other proper officers, shall thereupon grant their warrant for the lading or unlading of such goods.

Entry inwards by bill of sight.

XX. And be it further enacted, That if the importer of any goods shall declare upon oath before the Collector or Controller, or other proper officer, that he cannot, for want of full information, make perfect entry thereof, it shall be lawful for the Collector and Controller to receive an entry by bill of sight for the packages or parcels of such goods, by the best description which can be given, and to grant a warrant thereupon, in order that the same may be landed and secured to the satisfaction of the officer of the customs and at the expense of the importer, and may be seen and examined by such importer in the presence of the proper officers; and within three days after the goods shall have been so landed the importer shall make a perfect entry thereof, and pay down all duties due thereon; and in default of such entry, such goods shall be taken to the King's warehouse; and if the importer shall not, within one month after such landing, make perfect entry of such goods, and pay the duties due thereon, together with charges of removal and warehouse rent, such goods shall be sold for the payment thereof, and the overplus, if any, shall be paid to the proprietor of the goods.

Within three days after landing of goods entry to be made and duties paid.

Goods subject to ad valorem duty.

XXI. And be it further enacted, That in all cases where the duties imposed by this act upon the importation of articles into his Majesty's possessions in America or the island of Mauritius are charged, not according to the weight, tale, gauge, or measure, but according to the value thereof, such value shall be ascertained by the declaration of the importer of such articles, or his known agent, in manner and form following, that is to say:

Value to be declared on entry.

"I, A. B., do hereby declare that the articles mentioned in the entry and contained in the packages, [here specifying the several packages and describing the several marks and numbers, as the case may be,] are of the value of ——. Witness my hand, the —— day of ——.

"A. B.

"The above declaration signed the —— day of ——, in the presence of C. D., Collector, [or other principal officer."]

Which declaration shall be written on the bill of entry of such articles, and shall be subscribed with the hand of the importer thereof, or his known agent, in the presence of the Collector or other principal officer of the customs at the port of importation: Provided, That if, upon view and examination of such articles by the proper officer of the customs, it shall appear to him that the said articles are not valued according to the true price or value thereof, and according to the true intent and meaning of this act, then, and in such case, the importer or his known agent shall be required to declare on oath, before the Collector or Controller, what is the invoice price of such articles, and that he verily believes such invoice price is the current value of the articles at the place from whence the said articles were imported; and such invoice price, with the addition of ten pounds per centum thereon, shall be deemed to be the value of the articles, in lieu of the value so declared by the importer or his known agent, and upon which the duties imposed by this act shall be charged and paid: Provided also, That if it shall appear to the Collector and Controller, or other proper officer, that such articles have been invoiced below the real and true value thereof at the place from whence the same were imported, or if the invoice price is not known, the articles shall, in such case, be examined by two competent persons, to be nominated and appointed by the Governor or Commander-in-chief of the colony, plantation, or island, into which the said articles are imported, and such persons shall declare on oath, before the Collector or Controller, or other proper officer, what is the true and real value of such articles in such colony, plantation, or island; and the value so declared on the oaths of such persons shall be deemed to be the true and real value of such articles, and upon which the duties imposed by this act shall be charged and paid.

Mode of proceeding if goods be undervalued.

Proof of invoice price.

If necessary two persons may be nominated to fix the price.

XXII. And be it further enacted, That if the importer of such articles shall refuse to pay the duties hereby imposed thereon, it shall and may be lawful for the Collector or other chief officer of the customs where such articles shall be imported, and he is hereby respectively required to take and secure the same, with the casks, or other package thereof, and to cause the same to be publicly sold, within the space of twenty days at the most, after such refusal made, and at such time and place as such officer shall, by four or more days' public notice, appoint for that purpose, which articles shall be sold to the best bidder; and the money arising from the sale thereof shall be applied, in the first place, in payment of the said duties, together with the charges that shall have been occasioned by the said sale, and the overplus, if any, shall be paid to such importer or proprietor, or any other person authorized to receive the same.

If importer refuse to pay such duty, the goods may be sold.

XXIII. And be it further enacted, That every importer of any goods shall, within twenty days after the arrival of the importing ship, make due entry inwards of such goods, and land the same; and, in default of such entry and landing, it shall be lawful for the officers of the customs to convey such goods to the King's warehouse; and if the duties due upon such goods be not paid within three months after such twenty days shall have expired, together with all charges of removal and warehouse rent, the same shall be sold, and the produce thereof shall be applied, first, to the payment of freight and charges; next, of duties; and the overplus, if any, shall be paid to the proprietor of the goods.

If goods be not entered in twenty days, the officer may land and secure them.

If duties be not paid within three months, goods to be sold.

XXIV. And be it further enacted, That no goods shall be imported into any British possession as being imported from the United Kingdom, or from any other British possession, (if any advantage attach to such distinction,) unless such goods appear upon the cockets, or other proper documents, for the same to have been duly cleared outwards, at the port of exportation in the United Kingdom, or in such other British possession, nor unless the ground upon which such advantage be claimed be stated in such cocket or document.

Goods imported from United Kingdom or British possessions must appear in cocket, &c.

XXV. And be it further enacted, That no entry, nor any warrant for the landing of any goods, or for the taking of any goods out of any warehouse, shall be deemed valid, unless the particulars of the goods and packages in such entry shall correspond with the particulars of the goods and packages purporting to be the same in the report of the ship, or in the certificate or other document, where any is required, by which the importation or entry of such goods is authorized, nor unless the goods shall have been properly described in such entry by the denominations, and with the characters and circumstances according to which such goods are charged with duty, or may be imported; and any goods taken or delivered out of any ship, or out of any warehouse, by virtue of any entry or warrant, not corresponding or agreeing in all such respects, or not properly describing the same, shall be deemed to be goods landed or taken without due entry thereof, and shall be forfeited.

Entry not to be valid if goods be not properly described in it.

XXVI. And be it further enacted, That, before any sugar, coffee, cocoa-nuts, spirits, or mahogany, shall be shipped for exportation in any British possession in America, or in the island of Mauritius, as being the produce of such possession, or of such island, the proprietor of the estate on which such goods were produced, or his known agent, shall make and sign an affidavit, in writing, before the Collector or Controller at the port of exportation, or before one of his Majesty's Justices of the Peace, or other officer, duly authorized to administer such oath, residing in or near the place where such estate is situated, declaring that such goods are the produce of such estate, and such affidavit shall set forth the name of the estate, and the description and quantity of the goods, and the packages containing the same, with the marks and numbers thereon, and the name of the person to whose charge, at the place of shipment, they are to be sent; and if any Justice of the Peace, or other officer aforesaid, shall subscribe his name to any writing purporting to be such affidavit, unless the person purporting to make such affidavit shall actually appear before him, and be sworn to the truth of the same, such Justice of the Peace, or officer aforesaid, shall forfeit and pay, for any such offence, the sum of fifty pounds; and the person entering and shipping such goods shall deliver such affidavit to the Collector or Controller, or other proper officer, and shall make oath before him that the goods which are to be shipped by virtue of such entry are the same that are mentioned in such affidavit; and the master of the ship in which such goods shall be laden shall, before clearance, make oath before the Collector or Controller that the goods shipped by Certificate of production for sugar, coffee, cocoa-nuts, spirits, or mahogany.

Oath of the grower.

Oath of exporter.

Oath of the master.

virtue of such entry are the same as are mentioned and intended on such affidavit, to the best of his knowledge and belief; and thereupon the Collector and Controller, or other proper officer, shall sign and give to the master a certificate of production, stating that proof has been made, in manner required by law, that such goods, (describing the same,) are the produce of such British possession, or of such island, and setting forth in such certificate the name of the exporter, and of the exporting ship, and of the master thereof, and the destination of the goods; and if any sugar, coffee, cocoa-nuts, or spirits, be imported into any British possession in America, or into the island of Mauritius, as being the produce of some other such possession, or of such island, without such certificate of production, the same shall be forfeited; and if any mahogany be so imported, the same shall be deemed to be of foreign production.

Certificate of production on re-exportation from another colony.

XXVII. And be it further enacted, That before any sugar, coffee, cocoa-nuts, spirits, or mahogany, shall be shipped for exportation in any British possession in America as being the produce of some other such possession, or of the island of Mauritius, or shall be so shipped in the said island as being the produce of some British possession in America, the person exporting the same shall, in the entry outwards, state the place of the production, and refer to the entry inwards and landing of such goods, and shall make oath before the Collector or Controller to the identity of the same; and thereupon, if such goods shall have been duly imported, with a certificate of production, within twelve months prior to the shipping for exportation, the Collector and Controller shall sign and give to the master a certificate of production, founded upon and referring to the certificate of production under which such goods had been so imported, and containing the like particulars, together with the date of such importation.

Goods brought overland, or by inland navigation.

XXVIII. And whereas it is expedient to make regulations respecting the inland trade of the British possessions in America: Be it therefore enacted, That it shall be lawful to bring or import by land, or by inland navigation, into any of the British possessions in America, from any adjoining foreign country, any goods which might be lawfully imported by sea into such possessions from such country, and so to bring or import such goods in the vessels, boats, or carriages of such country, as well as in British vessels, boats or carriages.

What vessels shall be deemed British on the lakes in America.

XXIX. And be it further enacted, That no vessel or boat shall be admitted to be a British vessel or boat, on any of the inland waters or lakes in America, except such as shall have been built at some place within the British dominions, and shall be wholly owned by British subjects, and shall not have been repaired at any foreign place to a greater extent than in the proportion of ten shillings for every ton of such vessel or boat at any one time: Provided always, That nothing hereinbefore contained shall extend to prevent the employment of any vessel or boat, as a British vessel or boat, on such inland waters or lakes, which shall have wholly belonged to British subjects before the passing of this act, and which shall not be repaired, as aforesaid, in any foreign place after the passing of this act.

Goods must be brought to a place where there is a custom-house.

XXX. Provided always, and be it further enacted, That it shall not be lawful so to bring or import any goods, except into some port or place of entry at which a custom-house now is or hereafter may be lawfully established: Provided also, That it shall be lawful for the Governor, Lieutenant Governor, or person administering the Government of any of the said possessions, respectively, by and with the advice and consent of the Executive Council thereof, for the time being, if any Executive Council be there established, from time to time to diminish or increase, by proclamation, the number of ports or places of entry which are, or hereafter may be, appointed in such province for the entry of goods brought or imported as aforesaid.

Governor may appoint custom-houses.

Duties to be collected in same manner as on goods imported by sea.

XXXI. And be it further enacted, That the duties imposed by this act shall be ascertained, levied, and recovered, for and upon all goods so brought or imported, in the same manner, and by the same means, and under the same rules, regulations, restrictions, penalties, and forfeitures, as the duties on the like goods imported by sea may and can be ascertained, levied, or recovered, as far as the same are applicable; and if any goods shall be brought or imported contrary hereto, or if any goods so brought or imported shall be removed from the station or place appointed for the examination of such goods by the officers of the customs before all duties payable thereon shall have been paid or satisfied, such goods shall be forfeited, together with the vessel, boat, or carriage, and the horses or other cattle, in or by which such goods shall have been so imported or brought or so removed.

Duties in Canada on American boats, as in America on British boats.

XXXII. And be it further enacted, That the same tonnage duties shall be paid upon all vessels or boats of the United States of America importing any goods into either of the provinces of Upper or Lower Canada as are, or may be, for the time being, payable in the United States of America on British vessels or boats entering the harbors of the State from whence such goods shall have been imported.

Ports herein mentioned to be free warehousing ports.

XXXIII. And whereas it is expedient to constitute and appoint some of the free ports in America to be free warehousing ports for all goods which may be legally imported into the said ports, respectively; and it is also expedient to empower his Majesty to constitute and appoint, from time to time, any other ports in any of the said British possessions in America, to be, in like manner, free warehousing ports for such goods as may be legally imported into such ports respectively; and it is, therefore, necessary to make regulations for the appointing of proper warehouses at such ports, and for the lodging and securing of goods therein: Be it therefore enacted, That the several ports hereinafter mentioned, that is to say: Kingston, in the island of Jamaica; Halifax, in Nova Scotia; Quebec, in Canada; Saint John's, in New Brunswick; and Bridge Town, in the island of Barbadoes, shall be free warehousing ports for the purposes of this act; and that it shall be lawful for the several Collectors and Controllers of the said ports, respectively, by notice in writing, under their hand, to appoint, from time to time, such warehouses at such ports, respectively, as shall be approved of by them, for the free warehousing and securing of goods therein for the purposes of this act, and also in such notice to declare what sorts of goods may be so warehoused; and also, by like notice, to revoke or alter any such appointment or declaration: Provided always, That every such notice shall be transmitted to the Governor of the place, and shall be published in such a manner as he shall direct.

Goods may be warehoused without payment of duty.

XXXIV. And be it further enacted, That it shall be lawful for the importer of any such goods into the said ports to warehouse the same in the warehouses so appointed without payment of any duty on the first entry thereof, subject, nevertheless, to the rules, regulations, restrictions, and conditions hereinafter contained.

Stowage of goods in warehouse.

Locking and opening warehouse.

XXXV. And be it further enacted, That all goods so warehoused shall be stowed in such parts or divisions of the warehouse, and in such manner, as the Collector and Controller shall direct; and that the warehouse shall be locked and secured in such manner, and shall be opened and visited only at such time, and in the presence of such officers, and under such rules and regulations, as the Collector and Controller shall direct; and that all such goods shall, after being landed upon importation, be carried to the warehouse, or shall, after being taken out of the warehouse for exportation, be carried to be shipped under such rules and regulations as the Collector and Controller shall direct.

Carrying goods to and from warehouse.

Bond upon entry of goods to be warehous'd.

XXXVI. And be it further enacted, That, upon the entry of any goods to be warehoused, the importer of such goods, instead of paying down the duties thereon, shall give bond, with two sufficient sureties, to be approved of by the Collector or Controller, in treble the duties payable on such goods, with condition for the safe depositing of such goods in the warehouse mentioned in such entry, and for the payment of all duties due upon such goods, or for the exportation thereof, according to the first account taken of such goods upon the landing of the same; and with further condition that no part thereof shall be taken out of such warehouse until cleared from thence upon due entry and payment of duty, or upon due entry for exportation; and with further condition that the whole of such goods shall be so cleared from such warehouse, and the duties upon any deficiency of the quantity according to such first account shall be paid within two years from the date of the first entry thereof; and if, after such bond shall have been given, the goods, or any part thereof, shall be sold or disposed of, so that the original bonder shall be no longer interested in or have control over the same, it shall be lawful for the Collector and Controller to admit fresh security to be given by the bond of the new proprietor, or other person having control over such goods, with his sufficient sureties, and to cancel the bond given by the original bonder of such goods, or to exonerate him to the extent of the fresh security so given.

Purchaser of goods may give bond in lieu of original bond.

Goods not duly warehoused, &c., to be forfeited.

XXXVII. And be it further enacted, That if any goods which have been entered to be warehoused shall not be duly carried and deposited in the warehouse, or shall afterwards be taken out of the warehouse without due entry and clearance, or having been entered and cleared for exportation from the warehouse, shall not be duly carried and shipped, or shall afterwards be relanded, except with permission from the proper officer of the customs, such goods shall be forfeited.

Account of goods to be taken on landing.

No goods to be taken out without entry.

Deficiencies to be ascertained.

Duties to be paid upon deficiencies.

XXXVIII. And be it further enacted, That, upon the entry and landing of any goods to be warehoused, the proper officer of the customs shall take a particular account of the same, and shall mark the contents on each package, and shall enter the same in a book to be kept for that purpose; and no goods which have been so warehoused shall be taken or delivered from the warehouse, except upon due entry and under care of the proper officers, for exportation, or upon due entry and payment of duty for home use; and whenever the whole of the goods warehoused under any entry shall be cleared from the warehouse, or whenever further time shall be granted for any such goods to remain warehoused, an account shall be made out of the quantity upon which the duties have been paid and of the quantity exported, and of the quantity (to be then ascertained) of the goods still remaining in the warehouse, as the case may be, deducting from the whole the quantity contained in any whole packages (if any) which may have been abandoned for the duties; and if upon such account there shall, in either case, appear to be any deficiency of the original quantity, the duty payable upon the amount of such deficiency shall then be paid.

Samples may be taken.

XXXIX. And be it further enacted, That it shall be lawful for the Collector and Controller, under such regulations as they shall see fit, to permit moderate samples to be taken of any goods so warehoused without entry and without payment of duty, except as the same shall eventually become payable, as on a deficiency of the original quantity.

Goods may be sorted and repacked.

Duty due on first quantity.

Whole packages may be abandoned for duty.

XL. And be it further enacted, That it shall be lawful for the Collector and Controller, under such regulations as they shall see fit, to permit the proprietor, or other person having control over any goods so warehoused, to sort, separate, and pack and repack any such goods, and to make such lawful alterations therein, or arrangements and assortments thereof, as may be necessary for the preservation of such goods, or in order to the sale, shipment, or legal disposal of the same; and also to permit any parts of such goods so separated to be destroyed, but without prejudice to the claim for duty upon the whole original quantity of such goods: Provided always, That it shall be lawful for any person to abandon any whole packages to the officers of the customs for the duties without being liable to any duty upon the same.

All goods to be cleared within two years or sold.

Further time may be granted.

XLI. And be it further enacted, That all goods which have been so warehoused shall be duly cleared, either for exportation or for home consumption, within two years from the day of the first entry thereof; and if any such goods be not so cleared, it shall be lawful for the Collector and Controller to cause the same to be sold, and the produce shall be applied, first, to the payment of the duties; next, of warehouse rent and other charges; and the overplus (if any) shall be paid to the proprietor: Provided always, That it shall be lawful for the Collector and Controller to grant further time for any such goods to remain warehoused if they shall see fit so to do.

Bond on entry for exportation.

XLII. And be it further enacted, That, upon the entry outwards of any goods to be exported from the warehouse, the person entering the same shall give security, by bond, in treble the duties of importation on the quantity of such goods, with two sufficient sureties, to be approved by the Collector or Controller, that the same shall be landed at the place for which they be entered outwards, or be otherwise accounted for to the satisfaction of the Collector and Controller.

Power to appoint other ports.

XLIII. And be it further enacted, That it shall be lawful for his Majesty in council, from time to time, to appoint any port in his Majesty's possessions in America to be a free warehousing port for the purposes of this act; and every such port so appointed by his Majesty shall be a free warehousing port under this act, as if appointed by the same, in as full and ample a manner in all respects as any of the ports hereinbefore mentioned are free warehousing ports appointed by this act.

Goods from Mauritius liable to same duties and regulations as West India goods.

XLIV. And whereas it is expedient that all duties and regulations relating to importation and exportation into and from his Majesty's islands in the West Indies should be extended to the island of Mauritius: Be it therefore enacted, That all goods, wares, and merchandise, the growth, produce, or manufacture of the island of Mauritius, and all goods, wares, and merchandise which shall have been imported into the said island of Mauritius, and which shall be imported into any part of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, or into any possessions of his Majesty, his heirs or successors, shall be liable, upon such importation into the United Kingdom, or into any such possessions respectively, to the payment of the same duties, and shall be subject to the same regulations as the like goods, wares, and merchandise, being of the growth, produce, or manufacture of his Majesty's islands in the West Indies, and imported into the said United Kingdom, or into any such possessions respectively, would, on such importation, be liable to the payment of, or would be subject unto; and that upon the exportation of any goods, wares, or merchandise from the United Kingdom to the island of Mauritius, such goods, wares, or merchandise shall be liable to the same duties, and shall be entitled to the like drawbacks, respectively, as would or ought by law to be charged or allowed upon the like goods exported from the United Kingdom to any of his Majesty's islands in the West Indies; and that all goods, wares, and merchandise which shall be imported into or exported from the said island of Mauritius from or to any place whatever, other than the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, shall, upon such importation or exportation respectively, be liable to the payment of the same duties, and shall be subject to the same regulations, so far as any such regulations can or may be applied, as the like goods, wares, and merchandise would be liable to the payment of, or would be subject to, upon importation or exportation into or from any of his Majesty's islands in the West Indies; and that all ships and vessels whatever which shall arrive at or depart from the said island of Mauritius shall be liable to the payment of the same duties, and shall be subject to the same regulations as such ships or vessels would be liable to the payment of, or would be subject to, if arriving at or departing from any of his Majesty's islands in the West Indies.

Dutch proprietors in Demarara, Essequibo, and Berbice, may supply their estates from Holland.

XLV. And be it further enacted, That it shall be lawful for any of the subjects of the King of the Netherlands, being Dutch proprietors in the colonies of Demarara, and Essequibo, and of Berbice, to import in Dutch ships, from the Netherlands, into the said colonies, all the usual articles of supply for their estates therein; and also wine imported for the purposes of medicine only, and which shall be liable to a duty of ten shillings per tun, and no more; and in case seizure be made of any articles so imported upon the ground that they are not such supplies, or are for the purpose of trade, the proof to the contrary shall lie on the Dutch proprietor importing the same, and not on the seizing officer: Provided always, That if sufficient security by bond be given in court to abide the decision of the Commissioners of Customs upon such seizure, the goods so seized shall be admitted to entry and released.

Dutch proprietors may not export to United Kingdom or colonies.

XLVI. And be it further enacted, That it shall not be lawful for such Dutch proprietors to export the produce of their estates to the United Kingdom, or to any of his Majesty's sugar colonies in America.

What person shall be deemed Dutch proprietors.

XLVII. And be it further enacted, That all subjects of his Majesty the King of the Netherlands, resident in his said Majesty's European dominions, who were, at the date of the signature of the convention between his late Majesty King George the Third and the King of the Netherlands, dated the twelfth of August, one thousand eight hundred and fifteen, proprietors of estates in the said colonies; and all subjects of his said Majesty

Proprietors of estates.

who may hereafter become possessed of estates then belonging to Dutch proprietors therein; and all such proprietors as, being then resident in the said colonies, and being natives of his Majesty's dominions in the Netherlands, may have declared, within three months after the publication of the aforesaid convention in the said colonies, that they wish to continue to be considered as such; and all subjects of his said Majesty the King of the Netherlands who may be the holders of mortgages of estates in the said colonies, made prior to the date of the convention, and who may, under their mortgage deeds, have the right of exporting from the said colonies to the Netherlands the produce of such estates, shall be deemed Dutch proprietors under the provisions of this act; provided that, where both Dutch and British subjects have mortgages upon the same property in the said colonies, the produce to be consigned to the different mortgages shall be in proportion to the debts respectively due to them.

Holders of mortgages.

No ship to sail from Jamaica to St. Domingo, or from St. Domingo to Jamaica.

XLVIII. And be it further enacted, That no British merchant ship or vessel shall sail from any place in the island of Jamaica to any place in the island of Saint Domingo, nor from any place in the island of Saint Domingo to any place in the island of Jamaica, under the penalty of the forfeiture of such ship or vessel, together with her cargo; and that no foreign ship or vessel which shall have come from, or shall, in the course of her voyage, have touched at any such place in the island of Saint Domingo, shall come into any port or harbor in the island of Jamaica; and if any such ship or vessel, having come into any such port or harbor, shall continue there for forty-eight hours after notice shall have been given by the officer of the customs to depart therefrom, such ship or vessel shall be forfeited; and if any person shall be landed in the island of Jamaica from on board any ship or vessel which shall have come from, or touched at, the island of Saint Domingo, except in case of urgent necessity, or unless license shall have been given by the Governor of Jamaica to land such person, such ship shall be forfeited, together with her cargo.

Colonial laws repugnant to any act of Parliament to be null and void.

XLIX. And be it further enacted, That all laws, by-laws, usages, or customs, at this time, or which hereafter shall be in practice, or endeavored or pretended to be in force or practice, in any of the British possessions in America, which are in anywise repugnant to this act, or to any act of Parliament made, or hereafter to be made, in the United Kingdom, so far as such act shall relate to and mention the said possessions, are, and shall be, null and void to all intents and purposes whatsoever.

Officers may board ships hovering on the coast.

L. And be it further enacted, That it shall be lawful for the officers of customs to go on board any ship in any port in any British possession in America, and to rummage and search all parts of such ship for prohibited and uncustomed goods, and also to go on board any ship hovering within one league of any of the coasts thereof, and, in either case, freely to stay on board such ship so long as she shall remain in such port, or within such distance; and if any such ship be bound elsewhere, and shall continue so hovering for the space of twenty-four hours after the master shall have been required to depart, it shall be lawful for the officer of the customs to bring such ship into port and to search and examine her cargo, and to examine the master, upon oath, touching the cargo and voyage, and, if there be any goods on board prohibited to be imported into such possession, such ship and her cargo shall be forfeited; and if the master shall not truly answer the questions which shall be demanded of him in such examination, he shall forfeit the sum of one hundred pounds.

Forfeiture of vessels, carriages, &c., removing goods, liable to forfeiture.

LI. And be it further enacted, That all vessels, boats, and carriages, and all cattle made use of in the removal of any goods liable to forfeiture under this act, shall be forfeited; and every person who shall assist or be otherwise concerned in the unshipping, landing, or removal, or in the harboring of such goods, or into whose hands or possession the same shall knowingly come, shall forfeit the treble value thereof, or the penalty of one hundred pounds, at the election of the officers of the customs; and the averment in any information or libel to be exhibited for the recovery of such penalty, that the officer proceeding has elected to sue for the sum mentioned in the information, shall be deemed sufficient proof of such election, without any other or further evidence of such fact.

Goods, vessels, &c., liable to forfeiture, may be seized by officers.

LII. And be it further enacted, That all goods, and all ships, vessels, and boats, and all carriages, and all cattle liable to forfeiture under this act, shall and may be seized and secured by any officer of the customs or Navy, or by any person employed for that purpose, by or with the concurrence of the Commissioners of his Majesty's Customs; and every person who shall, in any way, hinder, oppose, molest, or obstruct any officer of the customs or Navy, or any person so employed as aforesaid in the exercise of his office, or any person acting in his aid or assistance, shall, for every such offence, forfeit the sum of two hundred pounds.

Writ of assistance to search for and seize goods liable to forfeiture.

LIII. And be it further enacted, That, under authority of a writ of assistance granted by the Superior or Supreme Court of Justice, or court of vice admiralty having jurisdiction in the place, (who are hereby authorized and required to grant such writ of assistance upon application made to them for that purpose by the principal officers of his Majesty's customs,) it shall be lawful for any officer of the customs, taking with him a peace officer, to enter any building or other place in the day time, and to search for and seize, and secure, any goods liable to forfeiture under this act; and, in case of necessity, to break open any doors, and any chests or other packages, for that purpose; and such a writ of assistance, when issued, shall be deemed to be in force during the whole of the reign in which the same shall have been granted, and for twelve months from the conclusion of such reign.

Obstruction of officers by force.

LIV. And be it further enacted, That if any person shall, by force or violence, assault, resist, oppose, molest, hinder, or obstruct any officer of the customs or Navy, or other persons employed as aforesaid in the exercise of his office, or any person acting in his aid or assistance, such person, being thereof convicted, shall be adjudged a felon, and shall be proceeded against as such, and punished at the discretion of the court before whom such person shall be tried.

Goods seized to be secured at next custom-house.

LV. And be it further enacted, That all things which shall be seized as being liable to forfeiture under this act shall be taken forthwith and delivered into the custody of the Collector and Controller of the Customs at the custom-house next to the place where the same were seized, who shall secure the same by such means and in such manner as shall be provided and directed by the Commissioners of his Majesty's Customs.

Goods seized to be sold by auction.

LVI. And be it further enacted, That all things which shall have been condemned as forfeited under this act shall, under the direction of the Collector and Controller, or other principal officer of the customs at the port where such seizure shall have been secured, be sold by public auction to the best bidder: Provided always, That it shall be lawful for the Commissioners of the Customs to direct in what manner the produce of such sale shall be applied, or, in lieu of such sale, to direct that any of such things shall be destroyed, or shall be reserved for the public service.

Jurisdiction for prosecution of seizures and penalties.

LVII. And be it further enacted, That all penalties and forfeitures which may have been heretofore or may be hereafter incurred shall and may be prosecuted, sued for and recovered, in any court of record or of vice admiralty having jurisdiction in the colony or plantation where the cause of prosecution arises; and in cases where there shall happen to be no such courts, then in any court of record or of vice admiralty having jurisdiction in some British colony or plantation near to that where the cause of prosecution arises; provided that, in cases where a seizure is made in any other colony than that where the forfeiture accrues, such seizure may be prosecuted in any court of record or of vice admiralty having jurisdiction either in the colony or plantation where the forfeiture accrues, or in the colony or plantation where the seizure is made, at the election of the seizer or prosecutor; and in cases where there shall happen to be no such courts in either of the last mentioned colonies or plantations, then in the court of record or of vice admiralty having jurisdiction in some British colony or plantation near to that where the forfeiture accrues, or to that where the seizure is made, at the election of the seizer or prosecutor.

Bail may be given for goods or ships seized.

LVIII. And be it further enacted, That if any goods or any ship or vessel shall be seized as forfeited under this act, or any act hereafter to be made, and detained in any of the British possessions in America, it shall be lawful for the Judge or Judges of any court having jurisdiction to try and determine such seizures, with the consent of the Collector and Controller of the Customs to order the delivery thereof on security by bond, with two sufficient sureties, to be first approved by such Collector and Controller, to answer double the value of the same in case of condemnation; and such bond shall be taken to the use of his Majesty in the name of the Collector of the Customs in whose custody the goods or the ship or vessel may be lodged, and such bond shall be delivered and kept in the joint custody of such Collector and his Controller; and in case the goods or the ship or vessel shall be condemned, the value thereof shall be paid into the hands of such Collector, who shall thereupon, with the consent or privity of his Controller, cancel such bond.

Suits to be commenced in name of officers of customs, &c.

LIX. And be it further enacted, That no suit shall be commenced for the recovery of any penalty or forfeiture under this act, except in the name of some superior officer of the customs or Navy, or other person employed as hereinbefore mentioned, or of his Majesty's advocate or Attorney General for the place where such suit shall be commenced; and if a question shall arise whether any person is an officer of the customs or Navy, or such other person as aforesaid, viva voce evidence may be given of such fact, and shall be deemed legal and sufficient evidence.

Onus probandi to lie on party.

LX. And be it further enacted, That if any goods shall be seized for non-payment of duties or any other cause of forfeiture, and any dispute shall arise whether the duties have been paid for the same, or the same have been lawfully imported, or lawfully laden or exported, the proof thereof shall lie on the owner or claimer of such goods, and not on the officer who shall seize and stop the same.

Claim to thing seized to be entered in name of the owner.

LXI. And be it further enacted, That no claim to anything seized under this act, and returned into any of his Majesty's courts for adjudication, shall be admitted, unless such claim be entered in the name of the owner, with his residence and occupation, nor unless oath to the property in such thing be made by the owner, or by his attorney or agent by whom such claim shall be entered, to the best of his knowledge and belief; and every person making a false oath thereto shall de deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall be liable to the pains and penalities to which persons are liable for a misdemeanor.

No person admitted to enter claim for anything seized, unless security first given.

LXII. And be it further enacted, That no person shall be admitted to enter a claim to anything seized in pursuance of this act, and prosecuted in any of the British possessions in America, until sufficient security shall have been given in the court where such seizure is prosecuted, in a penalty not exceeding sixty pounds, to answer and pay the costs occasioned by such claim; and in default of giving such security, such things shall be adjudged to be forfeited and shall be condemned.

A month's notice of action to be given to officers.

LXIII. And be it further enacted, That no writ shall be sued out against, nor a copy of any process served upon any officer of the customs or Navy, or other person as aforesaid, for anything done in the exercise of his office, until one calendar month after notice in writing shall have been delivered to him, or left at his usual place of abode, by the attorney or agent to the party who intends to sue out such writ or process; in which notice shall be clearly and explicitly contained the cause of the action, the name and place of abode of the person who is to bring such action, and the name and place of abode of the attorney or agent; and no evidence of the cause of such action shall be produced, except of such as shall be contained in such notice, and no verdict shall be given for the plaintiff, unless he shall prove on the trial that such notice was given; and in default of such proof the defendant shall receive in such action a verdict and costs.

Actions to be brought within three months of the cause of them.

LXIV. And be it further enacted, That every such action shall be brought within three calendar months after the cause thereof, and shall be laid and tried in the place or district where the facts were committed, and the defendant may plead the general issue, and give the special matter in evidence; and if the plaintiff shall become non-suited, or shall discontinue the action, or if, upon a verdict or demurrer, judgment shall be given against the plaintiff, the defendant shall receive treble costs, and have such remedy for the same as any defendant can have in other cases where costs are given by law.

Judge may certify probable cause of seizure.

LXV. And be it further enacted, That in case any information or suit shall be brought to trial on account of any seizure made under this act, and a verdict shall be found for the claimant thereof, and the Judge or court before whom the cause shall have been tried shall certify on the record that there was probable cause of seizure, the claimant shall not be entitled to any costs of suit, nor shall the person who made such seizure be liable to any action, indictment, or other suit or prosecution on account of such seizure; and if any action, indictment, or other suit or prosecution, shall be brought to trial against any person on account of such seizure, wherein a verdict shall be given against the defendant, the plaintiff, besides the thing seized, or the value thereof, shall not be entitled to more than two pence damages, nor to any costs of suit, nor shall the defendant in such prosecution be fined more than one shilling.

Officer may tender amends.

LXVI. And be it further enacted, That it shall be lawful for such officer, within one calendar month after such notice, to tender amends to the party complaining, or his agent, and to plead such tender in bar to any action, together with other pleas, and if the jury shall find the amends sufficient, they shall give a verdict for the defendant; and in such case, or in case the plaintiff shall become non-suited, or shall discontinue his action, or judgment shall be given for the defendant upon demurrer, then such defendant shall be entitled to the like costs as he would have been entitled to in case he had pleaded the general issue only: Provided always, That it shall be lawful for such defendant, by leave of the court where such action shall be brought, at any time before issue joined, to pay money into court as in other actions.

Judge may certify probable cause of action.

LXVII. And be it further enacted, That in any such action, if the Judge or court before whom such action shall be tried shall certify upon the record that the defendant or defendants in such action acted upon probable cause, then the plaintiff in such action shall not be entitled to more than two pence damages, nor to any costs of suit.

Recovery and application of penalties.

LXVIII. And be it further enacted, That all penalties and forfeitures recovered in any of the British possessions in America under this act shall be divided, paid, and applied as follows, that is to say: after deducting the charges of prosecution from the produce thereof, one-third part of the net produce shall be paid into the hands of the Collector of his Majesty's Customs at the port or place where such penalties or forfeitures shall be recovered for the use of his Majesty; one-third part to the Governor or Commander-in-chief of the said colony or plantation, and the other third part to the person who shall seize, inform, and sue for the same; excepting such seizures as shall be made at sea by the commanders or officers of his Majesty's ships-of-war, duly authorized to make seizures, one moiety of which seizures and of the penalties and forfeitures recovered thereon, first deducting the charges of prosecution from the gross produce thereof, shall be paid as aforesaid to the Collector of his Majesty's Customs, to and for the use of his Majesty, and the other moiety to him or them who shall seize, inform, and sue for the same, any law, custom, or usage, to the contrary nothwithstanding; subject, nevertheless, to such distribution of the produce of the seizures so made at sea, as well with regard to the moiety hereinbefore granted to his Majesty, as with regard to the other moiety given to the seizer or prosecutor, as his Majesty shall think fit to order and direct by any order or orders of council, or by any proclamation or proclamations to be made for that purpose.

Limitation of suits.

LXIX. And be it further enacted, That all actions or suits for the recovery of any of the penalities or forfeitures imposed by this act may be commenced or prosecuted at any time within three years after the offence committed, by reason whereof such penalty or forfeiture shall be incurred, any law, usage, or custom to the contrary notwithstanding.

Limitation of appeals.

LXX. And be it further enacted, That no appeal shall be prosecuted from any decree or sentence of any of his Majesty's courts in America, touching any penality or forfeiture imposed by this act, unless the inhibition shall be applied for and decreed within twelve months from the time when such decree or sentence was pronounced.

Persons authorized to make seizures under 5 G. 4, c. 113, to have the benefit of this act.

LXXI. And be it further enacted, That all persons authorized to make seizures under an act passed in the fifth year of the reign of his present Majesty, entitled "An act to amend and consolidate the laws relating to the abolition of the slave trade," shall, in making and prosecuting any such seizures, have the benefit of all the provisions granted to persons authorized to make seizures under this act.

Application of penalties under 5 G. 4, c. 113.

LXXII. And be it further enacted, That all penalities and forfeitures created by the said act passed in the fifth year of his present Majesty, whether pecuniary or specific, shall (except in cases specially provided for by the said act) go and belong to such persons as are authorized by that act to make seizures, in such shares, and shall and may be sued for and prosecuted, tried, recovered, distributed, and applied in such and the like manner, and by the same ways and means, and subject to the same rules and directions, as any penalties and forfeitures incurred in Great Britain and in the British possessions in America, respectively, now go and belong to, and may be sued, prosecuted, tried, recovered, and distributed, respectively, in Great Britain, or in the said possessions, under and by virtue of this act.

The King may regulate the trade of the Cape of Good Hope, &c.

LXXIII. And be it further enacted, That it shall be lawful for his Majesty, by and with the advice of his Privy Council, by any order or orders in council, to be issued from time to time, to give such directions and make such regulations touching the trade and commerce to and from any British possessions on or near the continent of Europe, or within the Mediterranean Sea, or in Africa, or within the limits of the East India Company's charter, (excepting the possessions of the said company,) as to his Majesty in council shall appear most expedient and salutary; and if any goods shall be imported or exported in any manner contrary to any such order of his Majesty in council, the same shall be forfeited, together with the ship importing or exporting the same.

East India Company may carry goods from India to colonies.

LXXIV. And be it further enacted, That it shall be lawful for the East India Company to trade in and export from any place within the limits of their charter any goods for the purpose of being carried to some of his Majesty's possessions in America, and so to carry and to import the same into any of such possessions; and also to carry return cargoes from such possessions to any place within the limits of their charter or to the United Kingdom; and that it shall be lawful for any of his Majesty's subjects, with license, in writing, granted by or under the authority of the said company, to lade in and export from any of the dominions of the Emperor of China any goods, and to lade in and export from any place within the limits of the said company's charter any tea, for the purpose of being carried to some of his Majesty's possessions in America, and, also, so to carry and import the same into any of such possessions.

Private persons may trade to China or in tea, having license from the company, but limited to the supply of the colonies.

Certificate of production of East India sugar.

LXXV. And be it further enacted, That it shall be lawful for any person, being the shipper of any sugar the produce of some British possession within the limits of the East India Company's charter, to be exported from any place in such possession, to go before the Collector or Controller, or other chief officer of the customs at such place, or, if there be no such officer of the customs, to go before the principal officer of such place, or the Judge or commercial resident of the district, and make and sign an affidavit before him that such sugar was really and bona fide the produce of such British possession, to the best of his knowledge and belief, and such officer, Judge, or resident, is hereby authorized and required to administer such affidavit, and to grant a certificate thereof, setting forth in such certificate the name of the ship in which the sugar is to be exported, and the destination of the same.

Not to repeal or alter the act 37 G. 3, c. 117.

LXXVI. And be it further enacted, That nothing in this act, or in any other act passed in this present session of Parliament, shall extend to repeal, or in any way alter or affect, an act passed in the thirty-seventh year of the reign of his late Majesty

King George III, entitled "An act for regulating the trade to be carried on with the British possessions in India by the ships of nations in amity with his Majesty;" nor to revoke, alter, or affect any regulations formed under the authority of that act, and which were in force at the time of the commencement of this act.

Ships built prior to January 1, 1816, deemed British ships within certain limits.

LXXVII. And be it further enacted, That all ships built at any place within the limits of the East India Company's charter prior to the first of January, one thousand eight hundred and sixteen, and which then were and have continued ever since to be solely the property of his Majesty's subjects, shall be deemed to be British ships, for all the purposes of trade within the said limits, including the Cape of Good Hope, anything in this act, or in any other act or acts passed in this present session of Parliament, to the contrary notwithstanding.

Certificate of production of Cape wine.

LXXVIII. And be it further enacted, That it shall be lawful for the shipper of any wine the produce of the Cape of Good Hope, or of its dependencies, which is to be exported from thence, to go before the chief officer of the customs and make and sign an affidavit before him that such wine was really and bona fide the produce of the Cape of Good Hope, or of its dependencies; and such officer is hereby authorized and required to administer such affidavit, and to grant a certificate thereof, setting forth in such certificate the name of the ship in which the wine is to be exported, and the destination of the same.

Certificate of production of goods in Guernsey, &c.

LXXIX. And be it further enacted, That it shall be lawful for any person who is about to export from any of the islands of Guernsey, Jersey, Alderney, or Sark, to the United Kingdom, or to any of the British possessions in America, any goods of the growth or produce of any of those islands, or any goods manufactured from materials which were the growth or produce thereof, or of the United Kingdom, to go before any magistrate of the island from which the goods are to be exported, and make and sign before him an affidavit that such goods, describing the same, are of such growth or produce, or of such manufacture, and such magistrate shall administer and sign such affidavit; and thereupon the Governor, Lieutenant Governor, or Commander-in-chief of the island from which the goods are to be exported, shall, upon the delivery to him of such affidavit, grant a certificate under his hand of the proof contained in such affidavit, stating the ship in which, and the port to which, in the United Kingdom or in any such possession, the goods are to be exported; and such certificate shall be the proper document to be produced at such ports, respectively, in proof that the goods mentioned therein are of the growth, produce, or manufacture of such islands respectively.

Tea and tobacco may not be imported into Guernsey, &c., except from United Kingdom.

LXXX. And be it further enacted, That it shall not be lawful to import into any of the islands of Guernsey, Jersey, Alderney, or Sark, any tea, nor any tobacco, except from the United Kingdom; and if any tea or any tobacco shall be brought into any of the said islands from any other place than from the United Kingdom, or not having been duly entered and cleared in the United Kingdom to be exported to such island, the same shall be forfeited.

Guernsey, &c., tonnage of ships and package of goods, viz: spirits, 100 tuns and 40 gallons.

LXXXI. And be it further enacted, That no brandy, Geneva, or other spirits, except rum, of the British plantation, shall be imported into or exported from the islands of Jersey, Guernsey, Alderney, or Sark, or either of them, or removed from any one to any other of the said islands, or coastwise from any one part to any other part of either of the said islands, or shall be shipped, in order to be so removed or carried, or shall be water-borne, for the purpose of being so shipped in any ship, vessel, or boat, of less burden than one hundred tons, nor in any cask or package of less size or content than forty gallons; nor any tobacco or snuff in any ship, vessel, or boat, of less burden than one hundred tons, nor in any cask or package containing less than four hundred and fifty pounds weight, (save and except any such spirits or loose tobacco as shall be for the use of the seamen belonging to and on board any such ship, vessel or boat, not exceeding two gallons of the former, and five pounds weight of the latter, for each seaman; and also except such manufactured tobacco or snuff as shall have been duly exported as merchandise from Great Britain or Ireland;) nor shall any wine be imported into or exported from the said islands of Guernsey, Jersey, Alderney, or Sark, or either of them, or carried from any one of the said islands to any other thereof, or coastwise from any one part to any other part of the said islands, or be shipped or water-borne, for the purpose of being shipped in any vessel or boat of less burden than sixty tons, or in any cask containing less than twenty gallons, or in any package containing less than three dozen reputed quart bottles, or six dozen reputed pint bottles, on pain of forfeiture of all such foreign brandy, Geneva, or other spirits, tobacco, snuff, or wine, respectively, together with the casks or packages containing the same; and also every such ship, vessel, or boat, together with all the guns, furniture, and ammunition, tackle, and apparel thereof.

Tobacco, 100 tons and 450 pounds.

Wine, 60 tuns and 29 gallons.

Not to extend to vessels of ten tons supplying island of Sark, having license so to do.

LXXXII. Provided always, and be it further enacted, That nothing herein contained shall extend, or be construed to extend, to subject to forfeiture or seizure, under any of the provisions of this act, any boat, not exceeding the burden of ten tons, for having on board at any one time any foreign spirits of the quantity of ten gallons or under, in casks or packages of less size or content than forty gallons, or any tobacco, snuff, or tea, not exceeding fifty pounds weight of each, for the supply of said island of Sark, such boat having a license from the proper officer of customs at either of the islands of Guernsey or Jersey, and for the purpose of being employed in carrying commodities for the supply of the said island of Sark; which license such officer of customs is hereby required to grant, without taking any fee or reward for the same: Provided always, That every such boat having on board at any one time any greater quantity of spirits than ten gallons, or any greater quantity of tobacco or snuff than fifty pounds weight of each of the said articles, unless such greater quantity of spirits, tobacco, or snuff, shall be in casks or packages of the size, content, or weight, hereinbefore required, or having on board at any one time any greater quantity of tea than fifty pounds weight, shall be forfeited.

Wine may be imported into Guernsey, &c., in casks, &c.

LXXXIII. Provided also, and be it further enacted, That nothing herein contained shall extend, or be construed to extend, to prevent the importation into or exportation from the said islands of Guernsey, Jersey, Alderney, or Sark, or either of them, of any wine, in bottles, shipped in cases or casks only, each containing at least three dozen reputed quart bottles, or six dozen reputed pint bottles: Provided always, That before any such wine, in bottles, shall be shipped for exportation to or for Great Britain or Ireland, the master or other person having the charge or command of the ship, vessel, or boat, in or on board of which such wine shall be so intended to be exported, together with one other sufficient surety, shall give bond in the penalty of forty shillings per gallon that the wine so shipped shall (the danger of the seas and enemies excepted) be duly entered and landed at the port or place in Great Britain or Ireland to or for which the same shall be declared at the time of giving such bond, (which bond and declaration the proper officer of his Majesty's customs is hereby authorized and empowered to take;) and such officer is required to furnish the master, or other person having the charge or command of the ship, vessel, or boat, in which any such wine may be, with a certificate specifying the number of such packages as aforesaid, and the quantity of wine contained in each, the date of the bond, and the name of the port or place to or for which the same shall be so declared; and such bond so given as aforesaid shall not be delivered up or cancelled until a certificate, under the hand of the proper officer of the customs in Great Britain or Ireland, of the due landing of the wine mentioned therein, shall be produced to and left with the officer taking said bond within three months after the date of such bond.

On exportation of wine in bottles, bond to be given.

LXXXIV. And be it further enacted, That every person who shall be found or discovered to have been on board any vessel or boat liable to forfeiture under any act relating to the revenue of customs for being found within one league of the islands of Guernsey, Jersey, Alderney, or Sark, having on board, or in any manner attached or affixed thereto, or having had on board, or in any manner attached or affixed thereto, or conveying, or having conveyed, in any manner, such goods or other things as subject such vessel or boat to forfeiture, or who shall be found or discovered to have been on board any vessel or boat from which any part of the cargo shall have been thrown overboard during chase, or staved or destroyed, shall forfeit the sum of one hundred pounds.

Penalty on persons found on board vessels liable to forfeiture within one league of Guernsey, &c.

LXXXV. And be it further enacted, That it shall not be lawful for any person to re-export, from any of his Majesty's possessions abroad, to any foreign place, any coals the produce of the United Kingdom; and that no such coals shall be shipped at any of such possessions, to be exported to any British place, until the exporter, or the master of the exporting vessel, shall have given bond, with one sufficient surety, in double the value of the coals, that such coals shall not be landed at any foreign place.

British coals not to be re-exported from British possessions.

LXXXVI. And be it further enacted, That this act may be amended, altered, or repealed by any act to be passed in the present session of Parliament.

Act may be altered this session.

CHAPTER CIX.

AN ACT for the encouragement of British shipping and navigation.—July 5, 1825.

Whereas an act was passed in the present session of Parliament, entitled "An act to repeal the several laws relating to the customs," in which it is declared that the laws of the customs have become intricate by reason of the great number of acts relating thereto which have been passed through a long series of years; and that it is therefore highly expedient for the interest of commerce and the ends of justice, and also for affording convenience and facility to all persons who may be subject to the operation of those laws, or who may be authorized to act in the execution thereof, that all the statutes now in force relating to the customs should be repealed, and that the purposes for which they have from time to time been made should be secured by new enactments, exhibiting more perspicuously and compendiously the various provisions contained in them; and whereas the laws relating to the encouragement of British navigation will thereby be repealed, and it is expedient to make provisions in lieu thereof, for the due encouragement of British shipping and British seamen, after such repeal shall have effect:

6 G. 4, c. 105.

Be it therefore enacted by the King's most excellent Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Lords spiritual and temporal, and Commons, in this present Parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same, That from and after the fifth day of January, one thousand eight hundred and twenty-six, this act shall come into and be and continue in full force and operation, and shall constitute and be the law of navigation of the British empire.

Commencement of act.

II. And be it further enacted, That the several sorts of goods hereinafter enumerated, being the produce of Europe, that is to say: masts, timber, boards, salt, pitch, tar, tallow, rosin, hemp, flax, currants, raisins, figs, prunes, olive oil, corn or grain, pot ashes, wine, sugar, vinegar, brandy, and tobacco, shall not be imported into the United Kingdom, to be used therein, except in British ships, or in ships of the country of which the goods are the produce, or in ships of the country from which the goods are imported.

Europe, enumerated goods in British ships, or ships of place, or ships of produce.

III. And be it further enacted, That goods the produce of Asia, Africa, or America shall not be imported from Europe into the United Kingdom, to be used therein, except the goods hereinafter mentioned, that is to say:

Goods of Asia, Africa, or America may not be imported from Europe, except in certain cases.

Goods the produce of places in Asia or Africa within the Straits of Gibraltar, or of the dominions of the Emperor of Morocco, imported from places in Europe within the Straits of Gibraltar;

Goods the produce of places within the limits of the East India Company's charter, which (having been imported into Gibraltar or Malta in British ships) may be imported from Gibraltar or Malta;

Goods taken by way of reprisal by British ships;

Bullion, diamonds, pearls, rubies, emeralds, and other jewels or precious stones.

Goods of Asia, Africa, or America may not be imported in foreign ships, except in certain cases.

IV. And be it further enacted, That goods the produce of Asia, Africa, or America shall not be imported into the United Kingdom, to be used therein, in foreign ships, unless they be the ships of the country in Asia, Africa, or America, of which the goods are the produce, and from which they are imported, except the goods hereinafter mentioned, that is to say:

Goods the produce of the dominions of the Grand Seignor, in Asia or Africa, which may be imported from his dominions in Europe in ships of his dominions;

Raw silk and mohair yarn, the produce of Asia, which may be imported from the dominions of the Grand Seignor in the Levant seas, in ships of his dominions;

Bullion.

Manufacture deemed produce.

V. Provided always, and be it further enacted, That all manufactured goods shall be deemed to be the produce of the country of which they are the manufacture.

From Guernsey, &c.

VI. And be it further enacted, That no goods shall be imported into the United Kingdom from the islands of Guernsey, Jersey, Alderney, Sark, or Man, except in British ships.

Exports to Asia, &c., and to Guernsey, &c.

VII. And be it further enacted, That no goods shall be exported from the United Kingdom to any British possession in Asia, Africa, or America, nor to the islands of Guernsey, Jersey, Alderney, Sark, or Man, except in British ships.

Coastwise.

VIII. And be it further enacted, That no goods shall be carried coastwise from one part of the United Kingdom to another, except in British ships.

Between Guernsey, Jersey, &c.

IX. And be it further enacted, That no goods shall be carried from any of the islands of Guernsey, Jersey, Alderney, Sark, or Man, to any other of such islands, nor from one part of any such islands to another part of the same island, except in British ships.

Between British possessions in Asia, &c.

X. And be it further enacted, That no goods shall be carried from any British possession in Asia, Africa, or America, to any other of such possessions, nor from one part of any of such possessions to another part of the same, except in British ships.

Imports, British possessions in Asia, &c.

XI. And be it further enacted, That no goods shall be imported into any British possession in Asia, Africa, or America, in any foreign ships, unless they be ships of the country of which the goods are the produce, and from which the goods are imported.

No ship British unless registered and navigated as such:

XII. And be it further enacted, That no ship shall be admitted to be a British ship unless duly registered and navigated as such; and that every British registered ship (so long as the registry of such ship shall be in force, or the certificate of such registry retained for the use of such ship,) shall be navigated during the whole of every voyage, (whether with a cargo or in ballast,) in every part of the world, by a master who is a British subject, and by a crew whereof three-fourths, at least, are British seamen; and if such ship be employed in a coasting voyage from one part of the United Kingdom to another, or in a voyage between the United Kingdom and the islands of Guernsey, Jersey, Alderney, Sark, or Man, or from one of the said islands to another of them, or from one part of either of them to another of the same, or be employed in fishing on the coasts of the United Kingdom, or of any of the said islands, then the whole of the crew shall be British seamen.

But vessels under 15 tons burden, admitted in navigation upon rivers, &c., although not registered. Under 30 tons for Newfoundland fishery.

XIII. Provided always, and be it further enacted, That all British built boats or vessels under fifteen tons burden, wholly owned and navigated by British subjects, although not registered as British ships, shall be admitted to be British vessels in all navigation in the rivers and upon the coasts of the United Kingdom, or of the British possessions abroad, and not proceeding over sea, except within the limits of the respective colonial Governments within which the managing owners of such vessels respectively reside; and that all British built boats or vessels, wholly owned and navigated by British subjects, not exceeding the burden of thirty tons, and having a whole or fixed deck, and being employed solely in fishing on the banks and shores of Newfoundland, and of the parts adjacent, or on the banks and shores of the provinces of Canada, Nova Scotia, or New Brunswick, adjacent to the Gulf of St. Lawrence, or on the north of Cape Canso, or of the islands within the same, or in trading coastwise within the said limits, shall be admitted to be British boats or vessels, although not registered, so long as such boats or vessels shall be solely so employed.

Honduras ships to be as British, in trade with United Kingdom.

XIV. Provided also, and be it further enacted, That all ships built in the British settlements at Honduras, and owned and navigated as British ships, shall be entitled to the privileges of British registered ships in all direct trade between the United Kingdom and the said settlements; provided the master shall produce a certificate, under the hand of the superintendent of those settlements, that satisfactory proof has been made before him that such ship (describing the same) was built in the said settlements, and is wholly owned by British subjects; provided also, that the time of the clearance of such ship from the said settlements, for every voyage, shall be endorsed upon such certificate by such superintendent.

Ship of any foreign country to be of the build of, or prize to such country; or British built, and owned and navigated by subjects of the country.

XV. And be it further enacted, That no ship shall be admitted to be a ship of any particular country unless she be of the build of such country; or have been made prize of war to such country; or have been forfeited to such country under any law of the same, made for the prevention of the slave trade, and condemned as such prize or forfeiture by a competent court of such country; or be British built, (not having been a prize of war from British subjects to any other foreign country;) nor unless she be navigated by a master who is a subject of such foreign country, and by a crew of whom three-fourths, at least, are subjects of such country; nor unless she be wholly owned by subjects of such country usually residing therein, or under the dominion thereof: Provided always, That the country of every ship shall be deemed to include all places which are under the same dominion as the place to which such ship belongs.

Master and seamen not British, unless natural born, or naturalized, or denizens, or subjects

XVI. And be it further enacted, That no person shall be qualified to be a master of a British ship, or to be a British seaman within the meaning of this act, except the natural born subjects of his Majesty, or persons naturalized by any act of Parliament, or made denizens by letters of denization; or except persons who have become British subjects by virtue of conquest or cession of some newly acquired country, and who shall have taken the oath of allegiance to his Majesty, or the oath of fidelity required by the treaty or capitulation by which such newly acquired country came into his Majesty's possessions; or persons who shall have served on board any of his Majesty's ships-of-war, in time of war, for the space of three years: Provided always, That the natives of the places within the limits of the East India Company's charter, although under British dominion, shall not, upon the ground of being such natives, be deemed to be British seamen: Provided always, That every ship, (except ships required to be wholly navigated by British seamen,) which shall be navigated by one British seaman, if a British ship, or one seaman of the country of such ship, if a foreign ship, for every twenty tons of the burden of such ship, shall be deemed to be duly navigated, although the number of other seamen shall exceed one-fourth of the whole crew.

by conquest or cession, or having served in his Majesty's ships-of-war.

One proper seaman to 20 tons sufficient.

XVII. Provided always, and be it further enacted, That it shall be lawful for his Majesty, by his royal proclamation during war, to declare that foreigners, having served two years on board any of his Majesty's ships-of-war, in time of such war, shall be British seamen within the meaning of this act.

Foreigners having served two years on board his Majesty's ships during war.

XVIII. And be it further enacted, That no British registered ship shall be suffered to depart any port in the United Kingdom, or any British possession in any part of the world, (whether with a cargo or in ballast,) unless duly navigated: Provided always, That any British ship, trading between places in America, may be navigated by British negroes; and that ships trading eastward of the Cape of Good Hope, within the limits of the East India Company's charter, may be navigated by Lascars, or other natives of countries within those limits.

British ship not to depart British port unless duly navigated, &c.

XIX. And be it further enacted, That if any British registered ship shall, at any time, have, as part of the crew in any part of the world, any foreign seaman not allowed by law, the master or owners of such ship shall, for every such foreign seaman, forfeit the sum of ten pounds: Provided always, That if a due proportion of British seamen cannot be procured in any foreign port, or in any place within the limits of the East India Company's charter, for the navigation of any British ship; or if such proportion be destroyed, during the voyage, by any unavoidable circumstance, and the master of such ship shall produce a certificate of such facts, under the hand of any British Consul, or of two known British merchants, if there be no Consul at the place where such facts can be ascertained, or from the British Governor of any place within the limits of the East India Company's charter; or, in the want of such certificate, shall make proof of the truth of such facts to the satisfaction of the Collector and Controller of the Customs of any British port, or of any person authorized in any other part of the world to inquire into the navigation of such ship, the same shall be deemed to be duly navigated.

If excess of foreign seamen, penalty £10 for each; except British seamen cannot be procured in foreign ports, or in India, or proportion destroyed unavoidably, and certificate produced or proof made.

XX. And be it further enacted, That if his Majesty shall, at any time, by his royal proclamation, declare that the proportion of British seamen necessary to the due navigation of British ships shall be less than the proportion required by this act, every British ship navigated with the proportion of British seamen required by such proclamation shall be deemed to be duly navigated so long as such proclamation shall remain in force.

Proportion of seamen may be altered by proclamation.

XXI. Provided always, and be it further enacted, That goods of any sort, or the produce of any place, not otherwise prohibited than by the law of navigation hereinbefore contained, may be imported into the United Kingdom from any place in a British ship, and from any place not being a British possession in a foreign ship of any country, and however navigated, to be warehoused for exportation only, under the provisions of any law in force for the time being, made for the warehousing of goods without payment of duty upon the first entry thereof.

Goods prohibited only by navigation laws may be imported for exportation.

XXII. And be it further enacted, That if any goods be imported, exported, or carried coastwise, contrary to the law of navigation hereinbefore contained, all such goods shall be forfeited, and the master of such ship shall forfeit the sum of one hundred pounds.

Forfeiture and penalty.

XXIII. And be it further enacted, That this act may be altered, varied, or repealed by any act or acts to be passed in this present session of Parliament.

Act may be altered this session.

CHAPTER XLVIII.

AN ACT to alter and amend the several laws relating to the customs.—May 26, 1826.

Whereas several acts were passed in the last session of Parliament for consolidating the laws of the customs, and it has been found necessary to make certain alterations and amendments therein:

Be it therefore enacted by the King's most excellent Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Lords spiritual and temporal, and Commons, in this present Parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same, That from and after the fifth day of July, one thousand eight hundred and twenty six, the same shall come into and be and continue in full force and operation for all the purposes mentioned therein.

Commencement of act.

II. And whereas an act was passed in the last session of Parliament, entitled "An act for the management of the customs," and it is expedient to alter and amend the same in manner hereinafter provided: Be it therefore enacted, That every order, document, instrument, or writing, required by any law, at any time in force, to be under the hands and seals of the Commissioners of his Majesty's Customs, which shall be signed by two or more Commissioners or assistant Commissioners of the Customs, shall be deemed to be an order, document, instrument, or writing, under the hands and seals of the Commissioners of his Majesty's Customs, within the meaning of such law.

Signature of two Commissioners to be sufficient without seals.

Duties of officers performed by persons and at places appointed by Commissioners.

III. And be it further enacted, That every act, matter, or thing, required by any law at any time in force to be done or performed by, to, or with any particular officer nominated in such law for such purpose, being done or performed by, to, or with any person appointed by the Commissioners of his Majesty's Customs to act for or in behalf of such particular officer, the same shall be deemed to be done or performed by, to, or with such particular officer; and that every act, matter, or thing, required by any law at any time in force to be done or performed at any particular place within any port, being done or performed at any place within such port appointed by the Commissioners of his Majesty's Customs for such purpose, the same shall be deemed to be done or performed at the particular place so required by law.

List of crews of ships from West Indies.

IV. And whereas another act was passed in the last session of Parliament, entitled "An act for the general regulation of the customs," and it is expedient to alter and amend the same in manner hereinafter provided: Be it therefore enacted, That so much of the said act as requires that the master of every British ship arriving at any port in the United Kingdom, on her return from any British possession in America, shall deliver upon oath to the Collecter or Controller a certain list of the crew of such ship, shall apply only to ships so arriving on their return from the West Indies.

Perfect entry after bill of sight.

V. And whereas, by the said act for the general regulation of the customs, it is enacted that no goods shall be unladen from any ship arriving from parts beyond the seas before due entry of such goods shall have been made; and that no entry for the landing of any goods shall be valid unless made in manner therein directed; and that any goods taken or delivered out of any ship by virtue of any entry not so made shall be deemed to be goods landed without due entry thereof, and shall be forfeited; and whereas provision is nevertheless made for the landing of goods in certain cases by bill of sight, for examination by the importer, in presence of the proper officers, prior to his making a perfect entry for the same: Be it therefore enacted, That such goods, although landed by bill of sight, shall not be deemed to be landed, or to be delivered out of the ship within the meaning of the said act, except in virtue of such perfect entry when the same shall have been made; and that if such perfect entry be not made in manner required by the said act for the landing of goods as hereinbefore mentioned, such goods shall then be deemed to be goods landed without due entry thereof, and shall be forfeited.

Restrictions on certain articles repealed.

VI. And be it further enacted, That so much of the said act made for the general regulation of the customs as prohibits the importation of any spirits on account of the strength thereof, and also so much of the said act as prohibits the importation of beef, pork, or bacon, to be warehoused for exportation only, shall be, and the same is hereby, repealed; and also so much of the said act as restricts in any way the importation of bonnets, hats, or platting of bast or straw, chip, cane, or horse hair, and also of cambrics or lawns, and also of coffee, and also of Or-molu, and also of Chinaware or porcelain, not being the produce of places within the limits of the East India Company's charter, and also any tobacco made up in rolls, being the produce of and imported from the State of Columbia, and in packages containing at least three hundred and twenty pounds weight of such rolls of tobacco, shall be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

Gloves only to be imported into port of London till July 5, 1827.

VII. And whereas it is expedient to subject the importation of gloves to certain restrictions: Be it therefore enacted, That it shall not be lawful to import any leather gloves into any port, other than the port of London, until after the fifth day of July, one thousand eight hundred and twenty-seven, nor unless in packages, each of which shall contain one hundred pairs of such gloves at least, nor unless in ships of the burden of seventy tons or upwards; and that such restrictions shall be complied with and enforced in like manner as if the same were set forth in a table denominated "a table of prohibitions and restrictions inwards," contained in the said act for the regulation of the customs.

Stamps on bonds for plate exported.

VIII. And be it further enacted, That all bonds given to prevent the relanding of plate, in respect of which any drawback shall be allowed upon the exportation thereof, shall be liable only to the same duties of stamps as any bonds given for or in respect of the duties of customs, or for preventing frauds or evasions thereof, are or shall be liable to under any act for the time being in force for granting duties of stamps.

Power to fix rate of rent in the King's warehouse.

IX. And be it further enacted, That it shall and may be lawful for the Commissioners of his Majesty's Treasury of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, or the Commissioners of his Majesty's Customs, by warrant or order under their hands respectively, to fix the amount of warehouse rent to be paid for any goods taken to and secured in any of the King's warehouses in the United Kingdom, or in the Isle of Man, for the security of the duties thereon, or to prevent the same from coming into home use.

Coast duty ad valorem.

X. And be it further enacted, That if any goods brought coastwise be subject to duty according to the value thereof, such value shall be ascertained in the same manner and under the same regulations and conditions as is and are directed in the said act in respect of goods imported from foreign parts.

Coffee imported into the Isle of Man.

XI. And be it further enacted, That it shall be lawful to export from the United Kingdom to the Isle of Man, and to import into the Isle of Man direct from the United Kingdom, without the license of the Commissioners of the Customs, any quantity of coffee of the British plantations upon which the duty payable in the United Kingdom shall have been paid; and that a drawback of four pence for every pound of such coffee shall be allowed upon the exportation thereof.

Licenses, for what vessels required.

XII. And whereas another act was passed in the last session of Parliament, entitled "An act for the prevention of smuggling," and it is expedient to alter and amend the same in manner hereinafter provided: Be it therefore enacted, That no license (except a license for arming) shall be required under the said act for any ship or vessel which is of the burden of two hundred tons or upwards, nor for any square-rigged ship or vessel, or any ship, vessel, or boat, propelled by steam, which is not of greater length than in the proportion of three feet six inches to one foot of breadth; and that no greater or other security shall be required on account of any license to be issued under the said act than in the sum of one thousand pounds, or in the single value of the vessel or boat for which such license is to be issued, if such value be less than one thousand pounds, and by the sole bond of such owner or owners of such vessel or boat: Provided always, That if any such bond shall be taken of the owner of any boat who shall not have attained the age of twenty-one years, such bond shall, nevertheless, be valid and effectual to all intents and purposes, anything in any act, or in any law, custom, or usage, to the contrary notwithstanding.

License bond.

Minors being owners of boats.

XIII. And be it further enacted, That no bond given on account of the license of any vessel or boat under the said act for the prevention of smuggling shall be cancelled until the space of twelve months after the license for which such bond had been entered into shall have been delivered up to the proper officer of the customs; and such bond shall remain in full force and effect for the time of twelve months after the delivering of the license as aforesaid, unless fresh security shall be given for such vessel or boat.

License bond not to be cancelled for twelve months.

XIV. And be it further enacted, That in case any vessel shall, on account of any goods, become liable to forfeiture under the said act for the prevention of smuggling, the goods creating such forfeiture shall also be forfeited.

Goods forfeited with vessel.

XV. And whereas, by the said act for the prevention of smuggling, it is enacted that if any foreign vessel shall, in certain cases therein described, be found within one league of the coast of the United Kingdom, such vessel shall be forfeited: Be it therefore enacted, That the like forfeiture shall, in similar cases, attach equally to any foreign boat as fully and effectually as if in the said act such forfeiture had been made to attach to any foreign vessel or boat.

Foreign boat within one league forfeited as foreign vessel would be.

XVI. And be it further enacted, That if any vessel or boat whatever shall arrive or shall be found or discovered to have been within any port, harbor, river, or creek, of the United Kingdom, not being driven therein by stress of weather or other unavoidable accident, having on board or in any manner attached or affixed thereto, or having had on board or in any manner attached or affixed thereto, or conveying or having conveyed in any manner, within any such port, harbor, river, or creek, any brandy or other spirits, except rum, in any cask or package of less size or content than forty gallons, except only for the use of the seamen then belonging to and on board such vessel or boat, not exceeding two gallons for each seaman, or any tobacco or snuff in any cask or package in which such tobacco or snuff could not be legally imported into the United Kingdom in such vessel, (except loose tobacco for the use of the seamen, not exceeding five pounds weight for each seaman,) every such vessel or boat, together with such spirits or tobacco, shall be forfeited; and every person found or discovered to have been on board such vessel or boat at the time of her becoming so liable to forfeiture, and knowing such spirits or tobacco to be or to have been on board or attached to such vessel or boat, shall forfeit the sum of one hundred pounds, and shall be liable to detention and prosecution, and to be dealt with in the manner directed by the said act for the prevention of smuggling, in cases of persons found or discovered to have been on board vessels liable to forfeiture under that act: Provided always, That if it shall be made to appear by proof on oath, to the satisfaction of the Commissioners of his Majesty's Customs, that the said spirits or tobacco were on board without the knowledge or privity of the owner or master of such vessel or boat, and without any wilful neglect or want of reasonable care on their or either of their behalfs, that then, and in such case, the vessel or boat shall not be liable to forfeiture, although the persons concerned in placing the said spirits or tobacco on board, or knowing thereof, shall be liable to detention and prosecution as aforesaid.

Vessels or boats arriving in port with spirits or tobacco in small packages forfeited, and persons found on board knowing thereof to forfeit £100.

XVII. And be it further enacted, That no writ of certiorari shall issue from his Majesty's Court of King's Bench, to remove any proceedings before any Justice or Justices of the Peace, under any act for the prevention of smuggling, or relating to the revenue of the customs; nor shall any writ of habeas corpus issue, to bring up the body of any person who shall have been convicted before any Justice or Justices of the Peace under any such act, unless the party against whom such proceedings shall have been directed, or who shall have been so convicted, or his attorney or agent, shall state in an affidavit in writing, to be duly sworn, the grounds of objection to such proceedings or conviction; and that upon the return to such writ of certiorari or habeas corpus, no objection shall be taken or considered, other than such as shall have been stated in such affidavit; and that it shall be lawful for any Justice or Justices of the Peace, and they are hereby required, to amend any information, conviction, or warrant of commitment, for any offence under any such act.

Writ of certiorari and habeas corpus not to be granted unless objection to proceedings be stated.

XVIII. And be it further enacted, That it shall not be lawful for the jailer or keeper of any prison, in virtue of any authority to him given by the said act for the prevention of smuggling, to discharge any person who shall have been committed to such prison for non-payment of any penalty or penalties, if such penalty or penalties shall amount to or exceed the sum of one hundred pounds, anything in the said act to the contrary notwithstanding.

Jailer not to discharge persons confined for £100.

XIX. And be it further enacted, That every intimation to any smuggling vessel or boat, in whatever manner given, shall be deemed to be a signal within the meaning of the said act for the prevention of smuggling, and shall subject the person giving such information to be detained and proceeded against as directed by the said act.

Signals to smuggling vessels.

XX. And be it further enacted, That upon the trial of any issue, or upon any judicial hearing or investigation, touching any penalty or forfeiture under any law or laws relating to the revenue of the customs or excise, or to the law of navigation, where it may be necessary to give proof of any order issued by the Commissioners of his Majesty's Treasury, or by the Commissioners of his Majesty's Customs or Excise, respectively, the letter or instructions which shall have been officially received by the officer of customs or excise at the place or district where such penalty or forfeiture shall have been incurred, or shall be alleged to have been incurred, for his Government, and in which such order is mentioned or referred to, and under which said instructions he shall have acted as such officer, shall be admitted and taken as sufficient evidence and proof of such order, to all intents and purposes whatsoever.

Proof on trial of Treasury order.

Goods of Asia or Africa within Straits of Gibraltar.

XXI. And whereas another act was passed in the last session of Parliament, entitled "An act for the encouragement of British shipping and navigation," and it is expedient to amend the same in manner hereinafter provided: Be it therefore enacted, That all goods, the produce of places in the interior of Asia or Africa, which shall be brought to any place in Europe within the Straits of Gibraltar, through places in Asia or Africa which are within those straits, shall be deemed to be the produce of such last mentioned places within the meaning of the said act.

Lascars and foreigners navigating East India ships. 4 G. 4, c. 80, § 21, 22.

XXII. And whereas, by an act passed in the fourth year of the reign of his present Majesty for consolidating and amending the laws then in force with respect to trade from and to places within the limits of the charter of the East India Company, particular provisions is made with respect to the number and country of the seamen by whom British ships engaged in such trade may, in certain cases, be navigated: Be it therefore enacted, That any British ship, navigated in the manner permitted by the said act, in any of the cases therein mentioned, shall be deemed to be duly navigated as British ships, anything in the before mentioned act for the encouragement of British shipping and navigation to the contrary notwithstanding.

Foreigners navigating ships in southern whale fishery.

XXIII. And whereas, by an act passed in the thirty-fifth year of the reign of his late Majesty King George the Third, entitled "An act for further encouraging and regulating the southern whale fisheries," certain foreigners were permitted to be employed as masters or seamen in navigating ships employed in such fisheries; and whereas the said act will, from and after the fifth day of July next, be repealed, and it is expedient to continue such privilege to persons who have been actually so employed: Be it therefore enacted, That it shall be lawful for any person who shall have been actually so employed, under the authority of the said act, to go before the Collector and Controller of the Customs, at the port from whence the ship in which he last so served shall have cleared out for the voyage on which he was employed in the same, and make proof of such service to the satisfaction of such Collector and Controller, and thereupon such Collector and Controller shall enrol the name of such person, and shall give to him a certificate of such proof; and such person producing such certificate shall, at all times thereafter, be deemed to hold the qualification of a British seaman, for the purpose of navigating any ship employed in the southern whale fisheries, anything in the law of navigation to the contrary notwithstanding.

Jurisdiction under act 6 G. 4, c. 108, extended to navigation law.

XXIV. And be it further enacted, That all penalties and forfeitures incurred under the said act for the encouragement of British shipping and navigation shall be sued for, prosecuted, recovered, and disposed of, or shall be mitigated or restored, in like manner as any penalty or forfeiture can be sued for, prosecuted, recovered, and disposed of, or may be mitigated or restored, under the before mentioned act passed in the last session of Parliament for the prevention of smuggling.

Ships built in colonies for owners in the United Kingdom to have certificate to navigate for two years.

XXV. And whereas another act was passed at the last session of Parliament, entitled "An act for the registering of British vessels," and it is expedient to alter and amend the same in manner hereinafter provided; and whereas by the said act it is provided that if any ship be built in Asia, Africa, or America, for owners residing in the United Kingdom, a certificate therein mentioned shall be given for the navigation of such ship to the United Kingdom, whether by a direct or circuitous voyage, and that such certificate shall, for such voyage, have all the force and virtue of a certificate of registry under that act: Be it therefore enacted, That such certificate shall be in like force for the navigation of such ship, for any voyages whatever, during the term of two years from the date of such certificate, if such ship shall not sooner arrive at some place in the United Kingdom.

Entry of bill of sale in book of intended registry.

XXVI. And whereas, by the said act for registering British ships, provision is made for the entering of any bill of sale of any ship or vessel, or any share thereof, in the book of registry at the port where such ship or vessel is registered, or in the book of intended registry, at any other port at which she is about to be registered de novo: Be it enacted, That such entry in the book of intended registry shall not be made until all the requisites of law for the immediate registry of the ship or vessel in such book have been complied with; nor shall such entry be valid or certified on the bill of sale until the registry de novo of the ship or vessel shall have been duly made, and the certificate thereof granted.

Levant Company.

XXVII. And whereas the company of merchants of England trading to the Levant seas has been dissolved: Be it therefore enacted, That it shall be lawful for any person who was a member of the said company at the time of its dissolution, and who was a resident at any of the factories of the said company, to continue to own any share or shares in any British registered ship of which, at the time of such residence, he was an owner or part owner, although such person shall continue to reside at any of the places where such factories had existed prior to the dissolution of the said company.

Goods the produce of and imported from particular places.

XXVIII. And whereas another act was passed in the last session of Parliament, entitled "An act for granting duties of customs," and it is expedient to alter and amend the same in manner hereinafter provided: Be it therefore enacted, That whenever lower duties are charged upon the importation of any of the goods hereinafter mentioned, as being the produce of particular places, such goods shall not be deemed to be the produce of such places, unless they be also imported from such places, that is to say: almonds, arrow root or powder, bark, cocus wood, copper, fustic, ginger, granilla, hemp, hides, honey, indigo, logwood, marmalade, cashew-nuts, cocoa-nuts, pimento, rhubarb, rosin, sarsaparilla, sponge, succades, sugar, tamarinds, tar, tortoise-shell, and turmeric.

Cambrics and other linens not rated according to the number of threads.

XXIX. And whereas, in the "table of duties of customs inwards," to the said act for granting duties of customs annexed, certain rated duties are imposed upon the several sorts of linen therein mentioned, some of which are to be ascertained according to the number of threads to the inch of warp of such linen, and an option is given to the importer to pay a duty of forty pounds for every one hundred pounds of the value of the linen, instead of any of the rated duties so imposed: Be it therefore enacted and declared, That from and after the tenth day of October, one thousand eight hundred and twenty-six, such option shall not be deemed to extend to cambrics, or to any sort of linen, the rated duties of which are not to be ascertained according to the number of threads in the same.

Ad valorem duty outwards.

XXX. And whereas, by the said act, a duty of ten shillings for every one hundred pounds of the value of certain goods is charged upon the exportation thereof: Be it therefore enacted, That such duty shall not be charged upon any goods which are subject to any other export duty.

Sweetened rum, how charged with duty.

XXXI. And whereas it is expedient to make further provisions for charging suitable duties on rum which shall have been sweetened by the coloring matter necessarily mixed with the same: Be it therefore enacted, That rum, the produce of the British possessions in America, shall not be liable to the duty charged on sweetened spirits, unless the actual strength thereof shall exceed the strength denoted by Sykes' hydrometer by more than ten degrees per centum; and that, in lieu of such duty, there shall be charged upon every degree per centum more than three degrees, and not more than ten degrees, by which the actual strength of any such rum shall exceed the strength denoted by Sykes' hydrometer, a duty of nine shillings and six pence: Provided always, That if the importer of any such rum cannot make a perfect entry thereof for payment of the proper duty on the actual strength of the same, it shall be lawful for such importer to demand, in writing, upon the entry, that trial be made of the actual strength of such rum, (he paying the expense of such trial,) instead of entering such rum for the payment of duty upon any stated number of such excessive degrees of strength: Provided, also, That all trials of the actual strength of rum shall be made by some skilful person appointed by the Commissioners of the Customs for such purpose.

East India Company's stores.

XXXII. And be it further enacted, That the East India Company shall be allowed to export stores, provisions, utensils of war, and necessaries for maintaining their garrisons and settlements, free of all duties; so as the duties hereby remitted, if they had been to be paid, would not have exceeded or do not exceed, in any one year, the sum of three hundred pounds.

Duty on small coals.

XXXIII. And whereas, in a table to the said act for granting duties of Customs annexed, denominated "a table of duties coastwise," a duty of one shilling the chaldron is imposed upon certain small coals shipped to be sent coastwise from the ports of Newcastle or Sunderland to any port in England or Wales, and such coals are not subject to the duty imposed in the said table upon coals brought coastwise: Be it therefore enacted, That the said duty of one shilling shall also be imposed upon the like sorts of small coals when shipped to be so sent from the ports of Liverpool, Bristol, Bridgewater, Gloucester, Chepstow, Cardiff, Newport, Swansea, Llanelly, Cardigan, Aberystwith, Whitehaven, Lancaster, Preston, Beaumaris, Milford, or Stockton, in like manner as when shipped to be sent from either of the said ports of Newcastle or Sunderland; and such coals shall also be free of duty when brought to any port in England or Wales, in like manner as if so brought from either of the said ports of Newcastle or Sunderland.

Duty on coals brought coastwise to any port in Wales.

XXXIV. And be it further enacted, That in lieu and instead of any duty on coals, except small coals hereinbefore mentioned, brought coastwise into any port in Wales, payable under the said act of the last session of Parliament, for granting duties of customs according to a table of duties thereunto annexed, denominated "a table of duties coastwise," there shall be paid upon all coals, except small coals as aforesaid, whether usually sold by weight or by measure, when brought coastwise from any port in the United Kingdom into any port in Wales, a duty of one shilling and eight pence for every ton weight of such coals; and such duty shall be raised, levied, collected, and paid unto his Majesty in like manner as if the same had been imposed by the said act, and set forth in the said table thereunto annexed.

Table of new duties.

XXXV. And be it further enacted, That instead of the duties and drawbacks imposed and allowed by the said act of the last session of Parliament for granting duties of customs, and set forth in a table thereunto annexed, denominated "table of duties of customs inwards," the several duties and drawbacks set forth in figures in the table hereinafter contained, and denominated "table of new duties," shall, in respect of such goods as are mentioned therein, be raised, levied, collected, and paid unto his Majesty, and be allowed, in like manner, as if such duties and drawbacks had been imposed and allowed in and by the said act, and had been set forth in the said table thereunto annexed, that is to say:

Tobacco to be charged on delivery weight.

XXXVI. And whereas another act was passed in the last session of Parliament, entitled "An act for the warehousing of goods," and it is expedient to alter and amend the same in manner hereinafter provided: Be it therefore enacted, That whenever any tobacco shall be taken out of the warehouse for home use, the same shall be re-weighed, and the duty shall be charged according to the weight then ascertained, although such tobacco may have increased or decreased in weight since the weight thereof had been before ascertained.

Pepper may be abandoned for the duty.

XXXVII. And be it further enacted, That within one month after any pepper shall have been warehoused it shall be lawful for the importer or proprietor to abandon any part thereof for the duty; and the quantity of such pepper not so abandoned, being thereupon ascertained, shall be deemed to be the quantity imported: Provided always, That no abatement of duty shall be made on account of any damage received by any pepper during the voyage.

Tobacco may be exported to Guernsey, &c., without license.

XXXVIII. And be it further enacted, That so much of the said act for the warehousing of goods as extends to prevent the exportation of tobacco from the warehouse to the islands of Guernsey, Jersey, Alderney, or Sark, without the license of the Commissioners of his Majesty's Customs, or to limit the quantity of tobacco which may be so exported to those islands, shall be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

Allowance of duties on coals used in works in Devon and Cornwall in smelting, &c.

XXXIX. And whereas another act was passed in the last session of Parliament, entitled "An act to grant certain bounties and allowances of Customs," and it is expedient to alter and amend the same in manner hereinafter provided: Be it therefore enacted, That the drawback of the duties upon coals allowed by the said act upon all coals used in works of the mines of tin, lead, or copper, in the counties of Devon and Cornwall, in roasting, calcining, smelting, or refining the said metals, or any of them, being the produce of such mines, shall be allowed in like manner upon coals so used in any works in those counties, although the same be not the works of such mines.

Allowance of duty on barilla for bleaching.

XL. And be it further enacted, That for any barilla used in the process of bleaching of linen before the fifth day of January, one thousand eight hundred and thirty, a repayment of the duties which had been paid on the importation of such barilla shall be made to the person so using the same, provided that the person claiming such repayment shall, within three calendar months next after the fifth day of January in each year, produce to the Commissioners of the Customs an account of the total quantity of barilla so used by him in the preceding year, showing when and where and by whom the duties on the same had been paid, and where the same had been used; and shall also prove, to the satisfaction of the said Commissioners, that the barilla mentioned in such account had within such year been actually used by him in the process of bleaching of linen; and thereupon a debenture shall issue for making such repayment at the port at or near to which such barilla shall have been so used.

Sail-cloth for bounty to be of certain weight.

XLI. And be it further enacted, That no bounty shall be allowed under the said act for granting bounties and allowances of customs upon the exportation of any sail-cloth, the weight of which shall be less than after the rate of forty-three pounds to thirty-eight square yards of the same, if the width be more than twenty inches, or after the rate of twenty-four pounds to thirty-eight running yards of the same, if the width be not more than twenty inches.

Bounty on sugar.

XLII. And be it further enacted, That nine-tenth parts of the several bounties granted by the last mentioned act upon the exportation of refined sugar until the fifth day of July, one thousand eight hundred and twenty-six, shall be, and the same are hereby, continued so long as the duties on the importation of sugar imposed by this act shall remain in force, or be further continued by any act hereafter to be made.

Free ports.

XLIII. And whereas another act was passed in the last session of Parliament, entitled "An act to regulate the trade of the British possessions abroad," and it is expedient to alter and amend the same in manner hereinafter provided; and whereas, by the said act certain goods are prohibited to be imported into any port or place in the British possessions in America, except into some of the ports into such possessions called free ports, and enumerated or described in a table contained in such act: Be it therefore enacted, That if any goods shall be imported into any port or place in the said possessions contrary to such prohibition, such goods shall be forfeited.

Rum from West Indies to Canada.

XLIV. And be it further enacted, That rum or other spirits the produce of any British possessions in South America or the West Indies, when imported from any British possession in America into Canada, shall not be deemed to be foreign, nor be charged with duty as such; and that the duty of six pence the gallon, imposed by the said act to regulate the trade of the British possessions abroad, upon such rum or other spirits when imported into Canada from the United Kingdom, shall be payable over and above any duty thereon there payable under any colonial law, anything in the said act, or this act, to the contrary notwithstanding.

Certain goods brought inland into Canada for exportation.

XLV. And be it further enacted, That all masts, timber, and ashes, brought by land or inland navigation into Canada, and duly shipped and exported from thence, shall, upon importation into the United Kingdom, be deemed to be, and be imported as, the produce of some British possession; and that it shall be lawful to bring into Canada, by land or inland navigation, any beef or pork, to be there warehoused for the purpose only of being exported to Newfoundland: Provided always, That security shall be given to the satisfaction of the Commissioners of his Majesty's Customs, upon the first entry of such beef and pork, that the same shall be duly conveyed to and warehoused in some warehousing port, to be from thence exported direct to Newfoundland.

Duty on wheat flour imported from a warehouse.

XLVI. And be it further enacted, That wheat flour which shall have been warehoused at any free warehousing port in the British possessions in North America, and which shall be imported direct from the warehouse at such port into any British possessions in the West Indies or in South America, shall, upon such importation, be liable only to a duty of one shilling for every barrel of such flour, instead of the duty of five shillings now payable on the same under the said act for regulating the trade of the British possessions abroad.

Goods not the produce of Mauritius imported from thence.

XLVII. And be it further enacted, That if any goods which had been imported into the island of Mauritus shall afterwards be imported from thence into any other British possession, or into the United Kingdom, the same shall be liable to the payment of the same duties, and shall be subject to the same regulations as the like goods would be liable to the payment of, or subject unto, if the same had been first imported into any of the British possessions in the West Indies, and afterwards imported from thence into such other British possession, or into the United Kingdom, respectively.

Tobacco imported into Guernsey &c. viz:

XLVIII. And be it further enacted, That so much of the said act for regulating the trade of the British possessions abroad as extends to prevent the importation of tobacco into the islands of Guernsey, Jersey, Alderney, or Sark, except from the United Kingdom, shall be, and the same is hereby, repealed; and that so much also of the said act as extends to prevent the importation of brandy, Geneva, or other spirits, or of tobacco or snuff, into the said islands in any ship or vessel of less burden than one hundred tons shall, so far as the same extends to ships or vessels which are not of less burden than seventy tons, importing any of such goods from the United Kingdom, be, and the same is hereby, repealed. from foreign parts, from United Kingdom.

XLIX. And be it further enacted, That no low wines or spirits shall be made, extracted, or distilled in the Isle of Man from any materials whatever; and if any person shall make, extract, or distil, or cause or procure to be made, extracted, or distilled, any low wines or spirits from any material whatever, or shall use or mix, or cause or procure to be used or mixed, any materials whatever with any worts or wash, in order to the making, extracting, or distilling of low wines or spirits, or shall put or lay, or cause or procure to be put or laid, in any vessel or utensils, any materials whatever for the purpose of preparing any worts or wash, or for making, extracting, or distilling low wines or spirits in the Isle of Man, that then, and in each and every of the said cases, every such person, and also every person in whose custody or possession shall be found any vessel or utensil made use of contrary to the intention of this act, shall, respectively, for every such offence, forfeit and pay the sum of two hundred pounds; and all such materials, and such worts and wash, low wines and spirits, and such vessels or utensils so made use of, shall be forfeited, and shall and may be seized by an officer of the customs; and all such penalties and forfeitures shall be sued for and prosecuted as any penalty or forfeiture relating to the customs may be sued for and prosecuted under an act passed in the last session of Parliament, entitled "An act for the prevention of smuggling." Distillation of low wines and spirits in the Isle of Man prohibited.

L. And whereas another act was passed in the last session of Parliament, entitled "An act to repeal the several laws relating to the customs," and it is expedient to amend the same, in order that certain acts mentioned therein should not be repealed: Be it therefore enacted, That so much of the said act as extends to repeal an act passed in the fourth year of the reign of his present Majesty, entitled "An act for regulating the number of apprentices to be taken on board British merchant vessels, and for preventing the desertion of seamen therefrom;" and also to repeal an act passed in the forty-third year of the reign of his late Majesty, entitled "An act for the better securing the freedom of elections of members to serve in Parliament for any place in Ireland, by disabling certain officers employed in the collection and management of his Majesty's revenues in Ireland from giving their votes at such elections;" and also to repeal so much of an act passed in the sixth year of the reign of King George II, entitled "An act for the better securing and encouraging the trade of his Majesty's sugar colonies in America," as imposes any duty to be paid to his Majesty; and also to repeal so much of an act passed in the seventh year of the reign of King George III, entitled "An act for granting certain duties in the British colonies and plantations in America for allowing a drawback of the duties of customs upon the exportation from this Kingdom of coffee and cocoa-nuts of the produce of the said colonies or plantations, for discontinuing the drawbacks payable on China earthenware exported to America, and for more effectually preventing the running of goods in the said colonies and plantations," as imposes any duty to be paid to his Majesty; and also to repeal so much of an act passed in the fourth year of the reign of King George III, entitled "An act to regulate the importation and exportation of certain articles subject to duties of excise, and certain other articles the produce and manufacture of Great Britain and Ireland, respectively, into and from either country, from and to the other, as relates to the excise, and which were enumerated in the said act, shall be, and the same is hereby, repealed. Certain acts not to be repealed. 4 G. 4, c. 25. 43 G. 3, c. 25. 6 G. 2, c. 13. 7 G. 3, c. 46. 4 G. 3, c. 30.

LI. And whereas, by the said act passed in the last session of Parliament to repeal the several laws relating to the customs, the several acts and parts of acts therein particularly enumerated and referred to, passed prior to the last session of Parliament, are repealed, or will, from and after the fifth day of July, one thousand eight hundred and twenty-six, be repealed, and it is expedient to repeal also several acts passed in the last session of Parliament: Be it therefore enacted, That the several acts hereinafter mentioned, passed in the last session of Parliament, shall be, and the same are hereby, repealed; that is to say, an act entitled "An act to reduce the duties on wine, coffee, and hemp, imported into the United Kingdom;" and another act entitled "An act for further regulating the trade of his Majesty's possessions in America and the West Indies, and for the warehousing of goods therein;" and another act entitled "An act to extend to the island of Mauritius the duties and regulations which relate to the British islands in the West Indies;" and another act entitled "An act to repeal certain duties of customs, and to grant other duties in lieu thereof," to continue until the fifth day of July, one thousand eight hundred and twenty-six, the bounties on refined sugar, and to alter the bounty on cordage. Certain acts of last session to be repealed. 6 G. 4, c. 13. 6 G. 4, c. 73. 6 G. 4, c. 76. 6 G. 4, c. 104.

LII. And whereas, by the said act of the last session of Parliament for repealing the several laws relating to the customs, together with this act, all the laws relating to the customs, made prior to the said act, are repealed, or are intended to be repealed, save and except certain acts hereinafter mentioned or described, relating to some particular subjects, and which are not intended to be repealed; and whereas, in conjunction with the said act passed in the last session of Parliament to repeal the laws of the customs, several other acts were passed for consolidating the laws of the customs, in order, as therein stated, that the purposes for which the former laws so repealed had from time to time been made should be secured by new enactments, exhibiting more perspicuously and compendiously the various provisions contained in them, and which several acts came into force and operation on the sixth day of January in the present year; and whereas it is expedient that no doubt should remain whether any, or what, if any, former or other acts, relating in any way to the customs, continue to have any force: Be it therefore enacted, That all statutes and acts, and all parts of statutes and acts, made in the respective Parliaments of General repeal of the laws of the customs, except certain laws hereinafter described or enumerated to be saved.

England, of Great Britain, of Ireland, and of the United Kingdom, relating to the revenue of customs, to navigation, or to the prevention of smuggling in any part of the British dominions, which were in force on the said fifth day of January, one thousand eight hundred and twenty-six, besides the several acts and parts of acts expressly repealed by the said repealing acts of last session, as hereinbefore amended, and by this act shall be, and the same are hereby, repealed, save and except such acts and parts of acts as are hereinafter mentioned or described, and declared to be saved and excepted from the effect of this general repeal, that is to say: an act passed in the eighteenth year of the reign of his late Majesty King George the Third, entitled "An act for removing all doubts and apprehensions concerning taxation by the Parliament of Great Britain in any of the colonies, provinces, and plantations in North America and the West Indies, and for repealing so much of an act made in the seventh year of the reign of his late Majesty as imposes a duty on tea imported from Great Britain into any colony or plantation in America as relates thereto;" and also so much of any act, or the part of any act now in force, which was passed prior to the last mentioned act, and by which any duties in any of the British possessions in America were granted, and still continue payable to the Crown, as relates to the collection and appropriation of such duties; and also an act passed in the thirty-first year of the reign of his late Majesty King George the Third, entitled "An act to repeal certain parts of an act passed in the fourteenth year of his Majesty's reign, entitled 'An act for making more effectual provisions for the government of the province of Quebec, in North America,' and to make further provisions for the government of the said province;" and also an act passed in the fifty-first year of the reign of his late Majesty King George the Third, entitled "An act for carrying into effect the provisions of a treaty of amity, commerce, and navigation, concluded between his Majesty and his Royal Highness the Prince Regent of Portugal;" and also an act passed in the fifty-ninth year of the reign of his late Majesty King George the Third, entitled "An act to carry into effect a convention of commerce, concluded between his Majesty and the United States of America, and a treaty with the Prince Regent of Portugal;" and also an act passed in the fifty-fifth year of the reign of his late Majesty, entitled "An act to amend the laws now in force for regulating the importation of corn;" and also another act passed in the first and second year of the reign of his present Majesty, entitled "An act to repeal certain acts passed in the thirty-first, thirty-third, forty-fourth, and forty-fifth years of his late Majesty King George the Third, for regulating the importation and exportation of corn, grain, meal, and flour, into and from Great Britain, and to make further provisions in lieu thereof;" and also an act passed in the third year of his present Majesty's reign, entitled "An act to amend the laws relating to the importation of corn;" and also an act passed in the sixth year of the reign of his present Majesty, entitled "An act to alter for one year, and until the end of the then next session of Parliament, the duty on wheat the produce of the British possessions in North America;" and also an act passed in the fifty-sixth year of the reign of his late Majesty King George the Third, entitled "An act to reduce the duty on the exportation from Great Britain of small coals of a certain description;" and also an act passed in the fifty-ninth year of the reign of his late Majesty King George the Third, entitled "An act to prevent the enlisting or engagement of his Majesty's subjects to serve in foreign service, and the fitting out or equipping, in his Majesty's dominions, vessels for warlike purposes without his Majesty's license;" and also an act passed in the fourth year of the reign of his present Majesty, entitled "An act to authorize his Majesty, under certain circumstances, to regulate the duties and drawbacks on goods imported or exported in foreign vessels, and to exempt certain foreign vessels from pilotage," as the said act is amended by an act passed in the fifth year of the reign of his present Majesty for that purpose; and also an act passed in the fourth year of the reign of his present Majesty, entitled "An act to consolidate and amend the several laws now in force with respect to trade from and to places within the limits of the charter of the East India Company, and to make further provisions with respect to such trade, and to amend an act of the present session of Parliament for the registering of vessels so far as relates to vessels registered in India;" and also an act passed in the fourth year of the reign of his present Majesty, entitled "An act for regulating vessels carrying passengers between Great Britain and Ireland;" and also an act passed in the fifty-fifth year of the reign of his late Majesty King George the Third, entitled "An act to repeal the provisions of former acts granting exclusive privileges of trade to the South Sea Company, and to indemnify the said company for the loss of such privileges;" and also another act passed in the said fifty-fifth year of the reign of King George the Third, made for amending the said last mentioned act; and also an act passed in the fifth year of the reign of his present Majesty, entitled "An act to amend the several acts for the encouragement and improvement of the British and Irish fisheries," and all other acts and parts of acts relating to the said fisheries which were in force upon the said fifth day of January, one thousand eight hundred and twenty-six; and also an act passed in the sixth and seventh years of the reign of King William the Third, and another act passed in the fifteenth year of the reign of his late Majesty King George the Third, and another act passed in the thirty-first year of the reign of his said Majesty, which several acts relate to certain keel boats and carriages, and for loading coals on board ships; and also an act passed in the sixth year of the reign of his present Majesty, entitled "An act to repeal the several laws relating to the performance of quarantine, and to make other provisions in lieu thereof;" and also an act passed in the forty-third year of his late Majesty, entitled "An act for the better securing the freedom of elections of members to serve in Parliament for any place in Ireland, by disabling certain officers employed in the collection or management of his Majesty's revenues in Ireland from giving their votes at such elections;" and also an act passed in the fourth year of the reign of his present Majesty, entitled "An act for regulating the number of apprentices to be taken on board British merchant vessels, and for preventing the desertion of seamen therefrom," and which act it is hereby declared and Exportation of tea not to be prevented.

At the Court of St. James, the 27th of July, 1826—Present, the King's Most Excellent Majesty in Council.

Whereas, by an act passed in the sixth year of the reign of his present Majesty, entitled "An act to regulate the trade of the British possessions abroad," after reciting that, "by the law of navigation, foreign ships are permitted to import into any of the British possessions abroad, from the countries to which they belong, goods the produce of those countries, and to export goods from such possessions to be carried to any foreign country whatever;" and that "it is expedient that such permission should be subject to certain conditions," it is enacted "that the privileges thereby granted to foreign ships shall be limited to the ships of those countries which, having colonial possessions, shall grant the like privileges of trading with those possessions to British ships; or which not having colonial possessions, shall place the commerce and navigation of this country, and of its possessions abroad, upon the footing of the most favored nation, unless his Majesty, by his order in council, shall in any case deem it expedient to grant the whole or any of such privileges to the ships of any foreign country, although the conditions aforesaid shall not in all respects be fulfilled by such foreign country;" and whereas the conditions mentioned and referred to in the said act of Parliament have not in all respects been fulfilled by the Government of the United States of America, and therefore the privileges so granted as aforesaid by the law of navigation to foreign ships cannot lawfully be exercised or enjoyed by the ships of the United States aforesaid, unless his Majesty, by his order in council, shall grant the whole or any of such privileges to the ships of the United States aforesaid; and whereas his Majesty doth deem it expedient to grant to the ships of the said United States such of the said privileges as are hereinafter mentioned, his Majesty doth therefore, with the advice of his Privy Council, and in pursuance and exercise of the powers and authorities in him vested by the said act of Parliament, declare and grant that it is and shall be lawful for the ships of the United States aforesaid to import into any of the British possessions abroad, from the said United States, goods the produce of the United States aforesaid, and not enumerated in the table of prohibitions and restrictions in the said act contained, and to export goods from such British possessions abroad to be carried to any foreign country whatever: Provided always, That such goods, so imported, shall be subject and liable to the payment of the duties imposed and made payable under and by virtue of the said act of Parliament; provided also, and his Majesty doth further, with the advice aforesaid, declare that the privileges so granted as aforesaid to the ships of the United States, so far as respects the British possessions in the West Indies and on the continent of South America, and so far as respects the Bahama islands and the Bermuda or Somer islands, and so far as respects his Majesty's settlements in the island of Newfoundland, and the several islands belonging to and dependent on those settlements, shall absolutely cease and determine upon and from the first day of December, which will be in this present year one thousand eight hundred and twenty-six; provided also, and his Majesty doth further, with the advice aforesaid, declare that the privileges so granted as aforesaid to the ships of the said United States, so far as respects the British possessions on the western coast of Africa, shall absolutely cease and determine upon and from the said first day of December, one thousand eight hundred and twenty-six; provided also, and his Majesty, with the advice aforesaid, doth further declare that the privileges so granted as aforesaid to the ships of the said United States, so far as respects the colony of the Cape of Good Hope, and the islands, settlements and territories belonging thereto and dependent thereupon, and so far as it respect the island of Mauritius, and the several islands and territories belonging thereto or dependent thereupon, and so far as respects the island of Ceylon, and the several islands and territories belonging thereto and dependent thereupon, shall absolutely cease and determine upon and from the first of March, which will be in the year one thousand eight hundred and twenty-seven; provided also, and his Majesty doth further, with the advice aforesaid, declare that the privileges so granted as aforesaid to the ships of the said United States, so far as respects his Majesty's settlements in the island of New Holland, and the several islands and territories belonging thereto and dependent thereupon, and so far as respects the island of Van Dieman's Land, and the several islands and territories belonging thereto and dependent thereupon, shall absolutely cease and determine upon and from the first day of May, which will be in the said year one thousand eight hundred and twenty-seven.

Provided also, That nothing in this present order contained extends, or shall be construed to extend, to infringe or interfere with the convention of commerce and navigation concluded between his late Majesty King George the Third and the United States of America, bearing date the third day of July, one thousand eight hundred and fifteen; or the further convention of commerce and navigation concluded between his said late Majesty and the United States of America, bearing date the twentieth day of October, one thousand eight hundred and eighteen; or to prevent ships of the said United States from importing into any of the British possessions in Europe, or from exporting from such British possessions in Europe any goods which, under or by virtue of the said conventions or either of them, or of the several acts of Parliament made for carrying such conventions into effect, can or may be lawfully imported into or exported from such British possessions in Europe in the ships of the said United States: and whereas by a certain act of Parliament passed in the fourth year of the reign of his present Majesty, entitled "An act to authorize his Majesty, under certain circumstances, to regulate the duties and drawbacks on goods imported or exported in foreign vessels, and to exempt certain foreign vessels from pilotage," it is, among other things, enacted "that it shall and may be lawful to and for his Majesty, by and with the advice of his Privy Council, or by his Majesty's order or orders in council, whenever it shall be deemed expedient, to levy and charge any additional duty or duties of customs, or to withhold the payment of any drawbacks, bounties, or allowances, upon any goods, wares or merchandise imported into or exported from the United Kingdom, or imported into or exported from any of his Majesty's dominions, in vessels belonging to any foreign country in which higher duties shall have been levied, or smaller drawbacks, bounties, or allowances granted upon goods, wares, or merchandise when imported into or exported from such foreign country in British vessels, than are levied or granted upon similar goods, wares and merchandise, when imported or exported in vessels of such country;" and it is thereby provided "that such additional or countervailing duties so to be imposed, and drawbacks, bounties, or allowances so to be withheld as aforesaid, shall not be of greater amount than may be deemed fairly to countervail the difference of duty, drawback, bounty, or allowance paid or granted on goods, wares, or merchandise imported into or exported from such foreign country in British vessels, more or less than the duties, drawbacks, bounties, or allowances there charged or granted upon similar goods, wares, or merchandise imported into or exported from such foreign country in vessels of such country."

And whereas, by an act of Parliament passed the fifth year of the reign of his present Majesty, entitled "An act to indemnify all persons concerned in advising, issuing, or acting under a certain order in council for regulating the tonnage duties on certain foreign vessels, and to amend an act of the last session of Paliament for authorizing his Majesty, under certain circumstances, to regulate the duties and drawbacks on goods imported or exported in any foreign vessels," it is, among other things, enacted "that it shall and may be lawful to and for his Majesty, by and with the advice of his Privy Council, or by his Majesty's order or orders in council, to be published from time to time in the London Gazette, (whenever it shall be deemed expedient,) to levy and charge any additional or countervailing duty or duties of tonnage upon or in respect of any vessels which shall enter any of the ports of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, or in any of his Majesty's dominions, and which shall belong to any foreign country in which any duties of tonnage shall have been or shall be levied upon or in respect of British vessels entering the ports of such country, higher or greater than are levied or granted upon or in respect of the vessels of such country; and it is thereby provided, that such additional or countervailing tonnage duties, so to be levied and charged as aforesaid, shall not be of greater amount than may be deemed fairly to countervail the difference of duty paid in such foreign country upon or in respect of the tonnage of British vessels more than the duty there charged or granted upon or in respect of the vessels of such country:" and whereas British vessels entering the ports of the United States aforesaid from the ports of his Majesty's possessions in America or the West Indies with cargoes consisting of articles of the growth, produce, or manufacture of the said possessions, are charged with a duty of $1 per ton for tonnage duties and light money, and a discriminating duty of 10 per cent. is charged upon the cargoes of such vessels, to which vessels of the United States, and cargoes of the same description, entering the ports of the United States from the ports of his Majesty's said possessions, are not subject, his Majesty, by virtue of the powers vested in him by the said acts of Parliament, passed in the fourth and fifth years of his Majesty's reign, by and with the advice of his Privy Council, is pleased to order, and it is hereby ordered, that there shall be charged on all vessels of the United States which shall enter any of the ports of his Majesty's possession on the continent of North America with articles of the growth, production, or manufacture of the said States, or which, until the said 1st day of December, 1826, shall enter with any such articles any of the ports of his Majesty's possessions in the West Indies or South America, or in the Bahama islands, or in the Bermuda or Somer islands, a duty of 4*s*. 3*d*. sterling for each and every ton burden of such vessels, equal, as nearly as may be, to 94 cents of the money of the United States, and being the difference between the tonnage duty payable by vessels of the United States and British vessels entering any of the ports of the said United States from any ports of his Majesty's dominions in America or the West Indies; and further, an addition of 10 per cent. upon the duties set forth in the said act of Parliament, passed as aforesaid in the sixth year of his Majesty's reign, on any of the articles therein enumerated, which may be imported into his Majesty's said possessions on the continent of North America in any vessel of the said United States, or which, until the said 1st day of December, 1826, may be imported into his Majesty's said possessions in the West Indies or South America, or into the Bahama islands, or into the Bermuda or Somer islands, in any such vessels of the said States; such duties to be levied, collected and applied in the same manner and to the same purposes as the duties levied under the authority of the said act of the sixth year of his Majesty's reign.

And the right honorable the Lords Commissioners of his Majesty's Treasury are to give the necessary directions herein accordingly.

C. C. GREVILLE.

ACTS OF CONGRESS IN RELATION TO COLONIAL TRADE.

AN ACT concerning navigation.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That from and after the thirtieth of September next the ports of the United States shall be and remain closed against every vessel, owned wholly or in part by a subject or subjects of his Britannic Majesty, coming or arriving from any port or place in a colony or territory of his Britannic Majesty that is or shall be, by the ordinary laws of navigation and trade, closed against vessels owned by citizens of the United States; and such vessel that, in the course of the voyage, shall have touched at or cleared out from any port or place in a colony or territory of Great Britain which shall or may be, by the ordinary laws of navigation and trade aforesaid, open to vessels owned by citizens of the United States, shall, nevertheless, be deemed to have come from the port or place in the colony or territory of Great Britain closed, as aforesaid, against vessels owned by citizens of the United States, from which such vessel cleared out and sailed before touching at, and clearing out from, an intermediate and open port or place as aforesaid; and every such vessel, so excluded from the ports of the United States, that shall enter or attempt to enter the same, in violation of this act, shall, with her tackle, apparel, and furniture, together with the cargo on board such vessel, be forfeited to the United States.

The ports of the United States closed, after September 30, 1818, against vessels owned by British subjects arriving from a colony which, by the ordinary laws, is closed against vessels owned by citizens of the United States.

Touching at a port which, by the ordinary laws, is open to vessels owned by citizens of the United States, does not vary the restriction.

Vessels and cargoes entering in violation of this act forfeited to the United States.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That from and after the aforesaid thirtieth of September next the owner, consignee, or agent of every vessel, owned wholly or in part by a subject or subjects of his Britannic Majesty, which shall have been duly entered in any port of the United States, and on board of which shall have been there laden for exportation any article or articles of the growth, produce, or manufacture of the United States, other than provisions and sea stores necessary for the voyage, shall, before such vessel shall have been cleared outward at the custom-house, give bond, in a sum double the value of such articles, with one or more sureties, to the satisfaction of the collector, that the article or articles so laden on board such vessel for exportation shall be landed in some port or place other than a port or place in a colony or territory of his Britannic Majesty, which, by the ordinary laws of navigation and trade, is closed against vessels owned by citizens of the United States; and any such vessel that shall sail, or attempt to sail, from any port of the United States, without having complied with the provision aforesaid, by giving bond as aforesaid, shall, with her tackle, apparel, and furniture, together with the article or articles aforesaid, laden on board the same as aforesaid, be forfeited to the United States: Provided always, That nothing in this act contained shall be so deemed or construed so as to violate any provision of the convention to regulate commerce between the territories of the United States and of his Britannic Majesty, signed the third day of July, one thousand eight hundred and fifteen.

After September 30, 1818, the owner, consignee, &c., of British vessels taking on board productions of the United States, in the ports thereof, except sea stores, &c., to give bond not to land them in a British colony or territory from which, by the ordinary laws, vessels of the United States are excluded.

Vessels sailing without bond, &c., and the articles on board, forfeited to the United States.

Proviso: nothing in this act to violate the commercial convention of July 3, 1815.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That the form of the bond aforesaid shall be prescribed by the Secretary of the Department of the Treasury; and the same shall and may be discharged, and not otherwise, by producing, within one year after the date thereof, a like certificate to that requried by, and under the regulations contained in, the eighty-first section of the act "to regulate the collection of duties on imports," passed the second day of March, seventeen hundred and ninety-nine, that the articles of the growth, produce, and manufacture of the United States, laden as aforesaid, were unladen and landed conformably to the provisions of this act, or, in cases of loss by sea, by capture, or other unavoidable accident, by the production of such other proofs as the nature of the case will admit, according to the provisions of the said eighty-first section of the act aforesaid.

Form of the bond to be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury. The bond may be discharged by producing within a year a certificate like that required by the 81st section of the act to regulate the collection of duties, &c.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That all penalties and forfeitures incurred by force of this act shall be sued for, recovered, distributed, and accounted for, and may be mitigated or remitted in the manner and according to the provisions of the revenue laws of the United States.

Penalties, &c., to be sued for, distributed, remitted, &c., according to the revenue laws.

[Approved April 18, 1818.]

AN ACT supplementary to an act entitled "An act concerning navigation."

After September 30, 1820, ports of the United States closed against British vessels coming from Lower Canada, New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, Newfoundland, St. John's, Cape Breton, Bermuda, Bahamas, or Caicos, &c.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That from and after the thirtieth day of September next the ports of the United States shall be and remain closed against every vessel, owned wholly or in part by a subject or subjects of his Britannic Majesty, coming or arriving by sea from any port or place in the province of Lower Canada, or coming or arriving from any port or place in the province of New Brunswick, the province of Nova Scotia, the islands of Newfoundland, St. John's, or Cape Breton, or the dependencies of any of them, the islands of Bermuda, the Bahama islands, the islands called Caicos, or the dependencies of any of them, or from any other port or place in any island, colony, territory, or possession under the dominion of Great Britain, in the West Indies or on the continent of America, south of the southern boundary of the United States, and not included within the act to which this act is supplementary. And every such vessel, so excluded from the ports of the United States, that shall enter, or attempt to enter, the same, in violation of this act, shall, with her tackle, apparel, and furniture, together with the cargo on board such vessel, be forfeited to the United States.

Vessel and cargo forfeited on attempting to enter.

Bonds to be given by the owner, &c., of British vessels after September 30, 1820, laden with articles of the growth, &c., of the United States for exportation, not to land them in the prohibited places.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That from and after the thirtieth day of September next the owner, consignee, or agent of every vessel, owned wholly or in part by a subject or subjects of his Britannic Majesty, which shall have been duly entered in any port of the United States, and on board of which shall have been there laden for exportation any article or articles of the growth, produce, or manufacture of the United States, other than provisions and sea stores necessary for the voyage, shall, before such vessel shall have been cleared outward at the custom-house, give bond, in a sum double the value of such article or articles, with one or more sureties, to the satisfaction of the Collector, that the article or articles so laden on board such vessel for exportation shall be landed in some port or place other than a port or place in any province, island, colony, territory, or possession belonging to his Britannic Majesty that is mentioned or described in this act, or in the act to which this act is supplementary. And every such vessel that shall sail, or attempt to sail, from any port of the United States, without having complied with the provisions aforesaid, by giving bond as aforesaid, shall, with her tackle, apparel, and furniture, together with the article or articles aforesaid, laden on board the same as aforesaid, be forfeited to the United States: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be deemed or construed so as to violate any provision of the convention to regulate commerce between the territories of the United States and of his Britannic Majesty, signed the third day of July, one thousand eight hundred and fifteen.

Vessels and articles forfeited for attempting to sail before bond given.

Proviso: nothing herein to violate the commercial convention of July 4, 1815.

After September 30, 1820, no goods, wares, or merchandise to be imported from the prohibited places, except they are wholly of the growth, &c., of the colony where laden and whence directly imported.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That from and after the thirtieth day of September next no goods, wares, or merchandise shall be imported into the United States of America from the province of Nova Scotia, the province of New Brunswick, the islands of Cape Breton, St. John's, Newfoundland, or their respective dependencies, from the Bermuda islands, the Bahama islands, the islands called Caicos, or either or any of the aforesaid possessions, islands, or places, or from any other province, possession, plantation, island, or place, under the dominion of Great Britain, in the West Indies or on the continent of America, south of the southern boundaries of the United States, except only such goods wares, and merchandise as are truly and wholly of the growth, produce, or manufacture, of the province, colony, plantation, island, possession, or place, aforesaid, where the same shall be laden, and from whence such goods, wares, or merchandise shall be directly imported into the United States; and all goods, wares, and merchandise imported, or attempted to be imported, into the United States of America, contrary to the provisions of this act, together with the vessel on board of which the same shall be laden, her tackle, apparel, and furniture, shall be forfeited to the United States.

Vessels and goods forfeited in case of importations contrary to this act.

This act to be carried into effect as act of April 18, 1818.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That the form of the bond aforesaid shall be prescribed, and the same shall be discharged, and all penalties and forfeitures incurred under this act shall be sued for, recovered, distributed, and accounted for, and the same may be mitigated or remitted in the manner and according to the provisions of the act to which this act is supplementary.

[Approved May 15, 1820.]

AN ACT in addition to the act concerning navigation, and also to authorize the appointment of Deputy Collectors.

The President, being satisfied that the ports of the British West India islands or colonies are open to vessels of the United States, may issue his proclamation declaring the ports, &c.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That, on satisfactory evidence being given to the President of the United States that the ports in the islands or colonies in the West Indies, under the dominion of Great Britain, have been opened to the vessels of the United States, the President shall be, and hereby is, authorized to issue his proclamation, declaring that the ports of the United States shall thereafter be open to the vessels of Great Britain employed in the trade and intercourse between the United States and such islands or colonies, subject to such reciprocal rules and restrictions as the President of the United States may, by such proclamation, make and publish, anything in the laws entitled "An act concerning navigation," or an act entitled "An act supplementary to an act concerning navigation," to the contrary notwithstanding.

In the event of the signature of a treaty, &c., concerning the navigation or commerce

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That, in the event of the signature of any treaty or convention concerning the navigation or commerce between the United States and France, the President of the United States be, and is hereby, authorized, should he deem the same expedient, by proclamation, to suspend, until the end of the next session of Congress, the operation of the act entitled "An act to impose a new tonnage duty on French ships and vessels, and for other purposes;" and also to suspend, as aforesaid, all other duties on French vessels, or the goods imported in the same, which may exceed the duties on American vessels, and on similar goods imported in the same.

between the United States and France, the President may, &c.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the aforesaid first and second sections of this act shall continue in force to the end of the next session of Congress, and no longer.

1st and 2d sections of this act in force until March 4, 1823.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That the third, fourth, and seventh sections of the act passed the third day of March, one thousand eight hundred and seventeen, entitled "An act to continue in force an act further to provide for the collection of duties on imports and tonnage, passed the third day of March, one thousand eight hundred and fifteen, and for other purposes," be, and the same are hereby, revived and made perpetual.

3d, 4th, & 7th sections of the act of March, 1817, continuing in force, &c.

[Approved May 6, 1822.]

AN ACT to regulate the commercial intercourse between the United States and certain British colonial ports.

1st, 2d, and 3d sections of the act concerning navigation, and the act of May 15, 1820, suspended as to certain British colonial ports.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That from and after the third day of March next the first, second, and third sections of the "act concerning navigation," approved on the eighteenth of April, one thousand eight hundred and eighteen, and the "act supplementary to an act concerning navigation," approved on the fifteenth of May, one thousand eight hundred and twenty, shall be, and the same are hereby, suspended for and during the continuance of this act, so far as any of the restrictions or prohibitions therein contained limit or interdict the intercourse of navigation or commerce between the ports of the United States and the British colonial ports hereinafter mentioned, to wit:

Kingston, in Jamaica.
Savannah Le Mar, in Jamaica.
Montego Bay, in Jamaica.
Santa Lucia, in Jamaica.
Antonio, in Jamaica.
Saint Ann, in Jamaica.
Falmouth, in Jamaica.
Maria, in Jamaica.
Morant Bay and Antonio Bay, in Jamaica.
Saint George, in Grenada.
Roseau, in Dominica.
Saint John's, in Antigua.
San Josef, in Trinidad.
Scarborough, in Tobago.
Road Harbor, in Tortola.
Nassau, in New Providence.
Pitt's Town, in Crooked Island.
Kingston, in Saint Vincent.
Port Saint George and Port Hamilton, in Bermuda.
Any port where there is a custom-house, in Bahamas.
Bridge Town, in Barbadoes.
Saint John's and Saint Andrew's, in New Brunswick.
Halifax, in Nova Scotia.
Quebec, in Canada.
Saint John's, in Newfoundland.
George Town, in Demarara.
New Amsterdam, in Berbice.
Castries, in Saint Lucia.
Basseterre, in Saint Kitts.
Charles Town, in Nevis.
Plymouth, in Montserrat.

The ports of the United States to be open to British vessels directly from such ports.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That from and after the said third day of March next the ports of the United States shall be open to any British vessel coming directly from any of the British colonial ports above enumerated; and it shall be lawful to import in the said vessels, being navigated by a master and three-fourths, at least, of the mariners, British subjects, any articles of the growth, produce, or manufacture of any of the British colonies, the importation of the like articles to which from elsewhere is not, nor shall not be, prohibited by law, and which may be exported from any of the said enumerated British ports to the United States, on equal terms, in vessels belonging to the said States.

The President may, by proclamation, declare no higher duty to be levied upon British vessels and goods from these ports than upon United States vessels, on certain conditions.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That on proof being given to the President of the United States, satisfactory to him, that upon the vessels of the United States admitted into the above enumerated British colonial ports, and upon any goods, wares, or merchandise imported therein in the said vessels, no other or higher duties of tonnage or impost, and no other charges of any kind, are levied or exacted than upon British vessels, or upon the like goods, wares, and merchandise imported into the said colonial ports from elsewhere, it shall and may be lawful for the President of the United States to issue his proclamation, declaring that no other or higher duty of impost or tonnage, and no other or higher duty or charge of any kind upon any goods, wares, or merchandise imported from the above enumerated British colonial ports in British vessels, shall be levied or exacted in any of the ports of the United States, (excepting the ports in the Territory of Florida,) than upon the vessels of the United States, and upon the like goods, wares, or merchandise imported into the ports of the United States in the same: Provided always, That until such proof shall be given, British vessels coming from the said British colonial ports, and the goods, wares, and merchandise imported in the same into the United States, shall continue to pay the foreign tonnage duty, and the additional duties upon goods, wares, and merchandise imported in foreign vessels, prescribed by the "act to regulate the duties on imports and tonnage," approved the twenty-seventh of April, one thousand eight hundred and sixteen.

Articles of the growth, produce, or manufacture of the British colonies only to be so imported in British vessels.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That no articles whatsoever, specie and bullion excepted, other than articles of the growth, produce, or manufacture of the British colonies to which the said enumerated ports belong, shall be imported into the United States in British vessels coming from any of the said enumerated ports; and that no articles whatsoever, being of the growth, produce, or manufacture of the British colonies to which the said enumerated ports belong, shall be imported into the United States in any British vessel, other than a vessel coming directly from one of the said enumerated ports, on pain of forfeiting all such articles, together with the ship or vessel in which the same shall have been imported, and her guns, tackle, apparel, and furniture.

And said vessels to come directly from said ports.

Goods of the United States may be exported directly to any of the said ports in British vessels.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That it shall be lawful to export from the United States directly to any of the above enumerated British colonial ports, in any vessel of the United States, or in any British vessel, navigated as by the second section of this act is prescribed, and having come directly from any of the above enumerated British colonial ports, any article of the growth, produce, or manufacture of the United States, or any other article legally imported therein, the exportation of which elsewhere shall not be prohibited by law: Provided, That when exported in any such British vessel, before the shipment of any such articles, security, by bond, shall be given to the United States in a penalty equal to half the value of the said articles; such bond to be taken of the owner, consignee, or agent, by the Collector of the port at which the said British vessel shall have entered, for the due landing of the said articles at the port or ports, being of the British colonial ports hereinabove enumerated, for which the said vessel shall clear out, and for producing a certificate thereof, within twelve months from the date of said bond, under the hand and seal of the Consul or Commercial Agent of the United States resident at the port where the said articles shall have been landed; or if there shall be no Consul or Commercial Agent of the United States residing there, such certificate to be under the hand and seal of the chief officer of the customs at such port, or under the hand and seal of two known and reputable merchants residing at such port; but such bond may be discharged by proof, on oath, by credible persons, that the said articles were taken by enemies, or perished in the seas. And it shall not be lawful to export from the United States any article whatsoever to any of the above enumerated British colonial ports in any British vessel other than such as shall have come directly from one of the said ports to the United States; nor shall it be lawful to export from the United States any article whatsoever in any British vessel having come from any of the said enumerated ports to any other port or place whatsoever than directly to one of the said ports. And in case any such articles shall be shipped or water-borne for the purpose of being exported contrary to this act, the same shall be forfeited, and shall and may be seized and prosecuted in like manner as for any other violation of the revenue laws of the United States.

Proviso.

This act to continue in force so long as the said ports are open to vessels of the United States.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That this act, unless repealed, altered, or amended by Congress, shall be and continue in force so long as the above enumerated British colonial ports shall be open to the admission of vessels of the United States, conformably to the provisions of the British act of Parliament of the 24th of June last, being the forty-fourth chapter of the acts of the third year of George the Fourth. But if at any time the trade and intercourse between the United States and all or any of the above enumerated British colonial ports, authorized by the said act of Parliament, should be prohibited by a British order in council or by act of Parliament, then, from the day of the date of such order in council, or act of Parliament, or from the time that the same shall commence to be in force, proclamation to that effect having been made by the President of the United States, each and every provision of this act, so far as the same shall apply to the intercourse between the United States and the above enumerated British colonial ports in British vessels, shall cease to operate in their favor; and each and every provision of the "act concerning navigation," approved on the eighteenth of April, one thousand eight hundred and eighteen, and of the act supplementary thereto, approved on the fifteenth of May, one thousand eight hundred and twenty, shall revive and be in full force.

Any other British colonial port being opened to vessels of the United States shall have the benefit of this act.

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That if any British colonial port in the American hemisphere, other than those hereinabove enumerated, should, by virtue of a British order in council, be opened to vessels of the United States, conformably to the provisions of the said act of Parliament of the twenty-fourth of June last, each and every provision of this act shall extend to the same from the time that it shall be so opened to the vessels of the United States.

Bond to be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury.

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That the form of the bond aforesaid shall be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury; and all penalties and forfeitures incurred under this act shall be sued for, recovered, distributed, and accounted for, and the same may be mitigated or remitted in the manner and according to the provisions of the revenue laws of the United States.

19TH CONGRESS.] No. 441. [2D SESSION.

INDEMNITY FOR SLAVES CARRIED AWAY BY GREAT BRITAIN IN 1815.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE IN EXECUTIVE SESSION DECEMBER 20, 1826.

Extract of Instructions from H. Clay to R. King, May 10, 1825.

"With respect to the other objects of the negotiation which was suspended on the 28th of July last, their great importance, and the new lights which are thrown upon them by subsequent events, and especially the effect on the colonial trade which is likely to be produced by the measures recently proposed in the British Parliament by Mr. Huskisson, the matured form of which has not yet reached us, require the most cautious and deliberate consideration. My recent entry upon the duties of the Department of State, and the great pressure of the mass of other business which called for immediate attention, have not allowed me yet to bestow on those objects the time which is indispensably necessary to the formation of a satisfactory adjustment. I am not, therefore, now ready to communicate to you the instructions of the President which they require. To detain you for them might have the effect of occasioning some injury to the current affairs of the legation, and to other interests demanding your presence at London. I have, therefore, the approbation of the President in requesting that, without waiting for them, you proceed on your voyage. As soon as I return from Kentucky, for which I expect in a few days to depart, I will commence the work of preparing them, and hope to be able to place them in your possession early in September. This delay is the less regretted, because, from the engagement of Mr. Huskisson in Parliament, who will probably be again associated in the negotiation, and from other obvious causes, it is not likely that it can be renewed before the approaching autumn, and no great intermediate mischief will probably accrue to any of the interests to which it relates. In the interval your time may be usefully dedicated to the object of a full and clear comprehension of the present state of the relations between the two countries; to the transaction, after your arrival in England, of occasional official business as it arises, and to an affair of much immediate practical consequence, to which I shall now proceed to direct your attention.

"You are aware that a convention between the United States and his Britannic Majesty was concluded and signed at St. Petersburg, under the mediation of the Emperor of all the Russias, on the 30th (12th) day of May, (June,) 1822, (see Appendix to the acts of the session of 1823,) for the purpose of carrying into effect the award of his Imperial Majesty, as arbitrator of the differences which had arisen between Great Britain and the United States out of the treaty of Ghent, in regard to slaves and other property carried away by the British forces in contravention to this treaty. By that convention a mixed commission was to be constituted to settle the just indemnification which his Imperial Majesty awarded to be due to the citizens of the United States for the slaves and property so deported. On the part of this Government Mr. Langdon Cheves was appointed, and on that of Great Britain, Mr. George Jackson. The Commissioners met at Washington on the 25th day of August, 1823, and, after various adjournments, their session continued until the 27th of April, 1825, when they adjourned to meet on the 8th of December following. The proceedings of the Board have been arrested by a most extraordinary refusal of Mr. Jackson to execute the fifth article of the convention, and it cannot be again made to move on to the accomplishment of the objects of its institution without the interposition of the British Government. Before I call your attention particularly to the exceptionable course which that Commissioner appears to have considered himself bound to adopt, I will make some observations upon the nature of the constitution of the Board. By the fifth article it is provided that, 'in the event of the two Commissioners not agreeing in any particular case under examination, or of their disagreement upon any question which may result from the stipulations of this convention, then, and in that case, they shall draw by lot the name of one of the two arbitrators, who, after having given due consideration to the matter contested, shall consult with the Commissioners, and a final decision shall be given conformably to the opinion of the majority of the two Commissioners and of the arbitrator so drawn by lot.' The whole practical inconvenience of such a general provision for submitting every question that might arise in every cause to arbitration, in the event of the non-concurrence of the Commissioners, was probably not foreseen at the conclusion of the convention. Experience has fully developed it. All interlocutory points, every preliminary question about the forms of trial, the authentication of evidence, its effects, and the rules of proceeding (and what a multitude of such points and questions may not occur?) are thus to be referred, in the contingency, but too often happening, of a disagreement between the Commissioners. If the settlement of one question settled the whole class to which it belonged in all analogous cases, the evil, which then would be still great, might be borne. But, unfortunately, the very same question (the sufficiency, for example, of the authentication of a deposition, or any other) may arise in different cases, and be determined according as the lot for the arbitrator may be cast. And thus it may, and most probably will, happen that the proof or the claim of one individual will be rejected under precisely the same circumstances of those of another which will be received and allowed.

"This malformation of the tribunal could have only been remedied by a spirit of mutual concession and accommodation between its component members. Such a spirit has, unfortunately, not been evinced in the course of its proceedings by Mr. Jackson. The protocol of the Commissioners, and so much of the correspondence between them as is necessary to put you in possession of what has been and of what has not been done accompany these instructions. From a perusal of those documents you will not fail to observe that he has manifested throughout the most impracticable disposition. I shall only advert to some of the instances of his course of conduct to sustain that remark.

"1. It became important, by some general rule, in the commencement of the proceedings of the Board, to notify claimants of the species of authentication of their depositions which would be required. The usual form of authenticating such acts is by the signature of the Justice who takes them, accompanied by the certificate and seal of the Governor of a State, Judge of a superior court, or Notary. This did not satisfy Mr. Jackson, who must also have the certifying officer to state that he knew the handwriting of the officiating Justice. Now, this extraordinary requisition (for by what tribunal, British or American, was it ever before made?) it is, in many cases, almost impossible to comply with. It may be asked, why did the American Commissioner concur in the adoption of such a rule? Because it was better to have some known rule, even a bad one, than none, and because it did not bind him to exclude testimony which should be authenticated in the usual and established forms.

"2. In the case of Cowper a question arose which is applicable to all the cases, and that is, whether interest should be allowed upon the ascertained value of the property carried away, in violation of the treaty of Ghent, as a part of that just indemnification which his Imperial Majesty awarded. Mr. Cheves thought interest was equally due with the principal. Mr. Jackson rejected it as wholly inadmissible. The discussions on this point have been extended to a great length. You will find them in the voluminous correspondence between the Commissioners themselves, and in the papers of Mr. Tazewell and Mr. Livingston in behalf of the claimants. If I could add anything to what has been so ably urged in support of the demand it would be unnecessary. Mr. Jackson endeavors to sustain his argument by a literal criticism on the text of the convention, rejecting, as unworthy of material consideration, the contemporaneous imperial acts. Mr. Cheves maintains his side of the question from the text, also, of the convention, from the terms and the spirit of the imperial decision, from analogous cases, and from the reason of the thing. And surely there can be no adequate conception of a just indemnification for injuries, the redress of which has been so long delayed, which does not comprehend interest. What is, briefly, the case? Great Britain, by the most solemn of compacts, stipulates not to transport from the American territories the most productive description of property. Her faith is promptly and perseveringly invoked to fulfil her obligations and do justice to the injured American proprietors. She withholds it upon the plea that she was not bound to the surrender of the property. The two Governments appeal to the Emperor of Russia to decide this point of difference, and his Imperial Majesty determines that Great Britain was bound by the treaty of Ghent to surrender the property, and awards a just indemnification. The convention which was subsequently concluded is merely the means of giving effect to the imperial award. And the question is, whether the parties who, more than ten years ago, ought to have had their property, with all its intervening use and profits, will have been justly indemnified without interest for the very great and, as the imperial decision proves, unjust delay, which Mr. Jackson is increasing by the very course which he has felt himself authorized to adopt? But I have said that it is not necessary, nor do I mean to discuss the point of interest. Whether it be just or not is not material in considering the exceptionable resolution to which he has brought himself. That resolution is not even to refer the claim of interest to the arbitrament expressly provided for in the fifth article of the convention. That article declares that, in the event of the two Commissioners not agreeing in any particular case under examination, &c., it shall be referred to a tribunal composed of them and an arbitrator to be designated by lot. A particular case is under examination; the Commissioners disagree in it. The casus fœderis occurs, and Mr. Jackson refuses to execute the fifth article. And on what pretext is this extraordinary refusal attempted to be supported? Upon the allegation that interest is, in his judgment, clearly excluded from the convention. He, no doubt, thinks so; Mr. Cheves, with equal honesty of intention, thinks otherwise; and this difference between them is precisely one of those cases of non-concurrence which were foreseen, and all of which, without exception, when, unfortunately, they shall arise, are to be submitted to the arbitrator. If Mr. Jackson is justified in the refusal, in this particular, to constitute the triple tribunal, what is to prevent his declining the reference in every other case? Undoubtedly if an unjust claim be preferred, either as it regards the right or the sufficiency of the evidence by which it is attempted to be substantiated, it is not within the convention; and Mr. Jackson may therefore refuse the reference in all cases in which he shall decide against the claimant. If, as he supposes, the claim of interest is not comprehended in the convention, that will be a sufficient ground for the determination of the arbitrator against it. The refusal to bring it to the test of the convention implies some distrust of the correctness of his own judgment, or an unreasonable want of confidence in the rectitude of the umpire. It is evident that, if the Commissioner representing one party has the right to predicate his refusal to refer a subject to the arbitrator upon his separate notion that it is not embraced in the convention, the great object of that instrument is defeated; for that object undoubtedly was, that neither party should absolutely decide, but that a mixed tribunal, in which both were to be represented, should pronounce on all controverted questions in which both are interested. And neither in the spirit nor in the terms of the convention is any countenance to be found for the idea that one class of controverted cases more than any other is excepted from its operation. If it be urged, on the one hand, that the effect of this broad ground of reference might be to draw within the jurisdiction of the mixed tribunal claims upon Great Britain which were never designed to be included in the convention, the argument will be answered, on the other, by stating that the opposite ground might put without their jurisdiction claims to which it was evidently intended to extend. The true answer is the same to both, and that is, that they are extreme cases, against which the only security is to be found in the integrity, intelligence, and obligations of the Board.

"3. In the case of Jumonville de Villiers, a citizen of Louisiana, the claim of indemnity for twenty slaves, carried away from Dauphin island, in the Bay of Mobile, does not appear to have been questioned by Mr. Jackson, upon the ground either of the sufficiency of the proof by which it was established, or the time of the transportation of the slaves; but to the allowance of the claim he objected, upon the pretence that Dauphin island was no part of the territory of the United States, but belonged to West Florida. Mr. Cheves, declining to discuss our incontestable right to that island, derived from the cession of Louisiana, of which it constituted a part, offered to refer the difference between him and his associate, agreeably to the provisions of the fifth article of the convention; but Mr. Jackson, having erected himself into a judge of what belonged to us and what to Spain, decided that Dauphin island was not an appendage of Louisiana, but of West Florida, and therefore belonged to Spain at the period of the exchange of the ratifications of the treaty of Ghent, and refused to consent to the proposed reference. Dauphin island was, during the late war, reduced and occupied by the British arms as a part of the territory of the United States. Had it not been a part of their territory, the military occupation of it by Great Britain would have been an unprovoked act of war on her part against Spain, with whom she was then in peace. It was, on the return of peace, surrendered to the United States as a 'territory, place, or possession' (to use the language of the treaty of Ghent) taken from them during the war. Thus, in order to screen the British Government from the indemnity due to American citizens for one or two hundred negro slaves, Mr. Jackson would represent his nation as having committed an act of deliberate and wanton war upon the territories of a friendly and unoffending sovereign, and as having, after perpetrating that act of enormity, transferred the territory violently wrested from that sovereign to the United States, who had no right to it. The mere statement of the case, which truth compels me to make, must wound the sensibility of his Britannic Majesty's Government. If it were creditable to discuss the question of the right of the United States to Dauphin island, it would be easy to show that the Province of Louisiana, which was ceded to them on the 30th of April, 1803, extended as far east as the Perdido, and, of course, included the Bay of Mobile; that, prior to the late war with Great Britain, the United States had actually taken possession of the whole Province up to that limit; that they had incorporated the Bay of Mobile, including Dauphin island, in one of their territories, and governed it by their laws; and that the treaty with Spain of the 22d day of February, 1819, did not operate as an original cession, but only as a confirmation of their previous title, acquired under that with France, to the country lying between the Perdido and the island of New Orleans. It would have been a more compendious mode of disposing of this claim, on the part of Mr. Jackson, to have drawn in question our title to any part of Louisiana, as was done during the conferences at Ghent. He would then have gotten rid of the territory, the claimant, and his slaves. But the conclusive answer to his plea is to be found in the terms of the first article of the treaty of Ghent. They stipulate that 'all territory, places, and possessions whatsoever taken by either party from the other during the war, or which may be taken after the signing of this treaty, excepting only the islands hereinafter mentioned, shall be restored without delay, and without causing any destruction, or carrying away any of the artillery or other public property originally captured in the said forts or places, and which shall remain therein upon the exchange of the ratifications of this treaty, or any slaves or other private property.' Dauphin island was not one of those which were excepted from surrender. That article binds the high contracting parties to a mutual restoration of territory, places, and possessions, without regard to the consideration of title. The mere fact of possession prior to the war determined the duty of restoration on the return of peace. It was so intended, and well understood by both parties. Under that stipulation, as being one of the possessions taken from us during the war, the mouth of the Columbia has been restored, although our title to it was subsequently contested by Great Britain. And from none of the places or possessions thus to be restored was Great Britain to carry away any slave or other property. If this impeachment of our title to or possession of Dauphin island (for which, at an earlier period, Mr. Jackson might have been entitled to the grateful acknowledgments of Spain, but which, at this late day, will hardly be made) had been even colorable, the claim of D'Villiers might have presented a fit subject of reference to the arbitrator of the convention. Incontestable as both title and possession were, Mr. Cheves, in consideration of what belonged to the character and dignity of his Government, would not have been without justification if he had declined an arbitration of the question had it been offered by the other Commissioner. In tendering it himself, you cannot fail to perceive manifested by him the greatest moderation and the strongest disposition faithfully to execute the fifth article of the convention. Nor can you avoid contrasting the conduct of the two Commissioners in this respect. Whilst Mr. Jackson refuses to refer, to say the least of it, the debatable question of interest, Mr. Cheves is willing to refer a case in which our clear and indisputable right to Dauphin island was the only point to be collaterally adjudicated.

"4. By the third article of the convention his Britannic Majesty engaged 'to cause to be produced before the commission, as material towards ascertaining facts, all the evidence of which his Majesty's Government may be in possession, by returns from his Majesty's officers or otherwise, of the number of slaves carried away.' On the 25th of October last Mr. Rush requested of Mr. Canning the fulfilment of that undertaking. Mr. Canning, in a note to Mr. Rush, under date the 16th of February last, informed him that he lost 'no time in directing the necessary returns to be prepared. This has been done in as far as the records in the possession of his Majesty's Government could supply the information required, and the returns have been forwarded to Mr. Jackson at Washington for the use of the mixed British and American commission.' From the well known fairness and straightforwardness of Mr. Canning, there can be no doubt that Mr. Jackson was made the medium merely of communicating, unconditionally, the information thus collected to the Board. Instead of promptly performing that duty, keeping the documents in his own possession, he opened a negotiation with Mr. Cheves as to the uses which should be made of them after they came into the joint possession of the Board. He insisted, as one of the conditions upon which they should be delivered over to the commission, that all access to them should be denied to the claimants until the testimony was closed in their respective cases, and they were put down for final trial; and then that each claimant might be cautiously allowed to inspect so much of the returns as related to his particular case, and no more. The object of the stipulation undoubtedly was to supply all the testimony which might happen to be in the custody of the British Government respecting facts very difficult to prove. Its operation was in the nature of a discovery of evidence, which the ordinary tribunals of the two countries, in cases of individual litigation, would have enforced, but which, in national concerns, could only be provided for by treaty. The evidence thus discovered and produced might supply the defects of other proof, or might, itself, require the explanations which other testimony could render. But how were these explanations to be made if the returns were to be locked up from the view of the parties whose interests were to be affected? Mr. Jackson seems to have supposed that testimony which was to be furnished for the benefit of both parties ought to be employed exclusively for that of one of them as a check upon what might be produced by the other. The party was, according to him, to be indulged, at the last moment, as a gracious favor, with a view of that evidence which was possibly to defeat his just expectations, although a timely examination of it would have enabled him to have adduced the most conclusive explanatory proof. And where does Mr. Jackson find any precedent for the extraordinary condition which he would have imposed? Surely not in the enlightened judicial codes of either of the two countries, unless he goes as far back as to the proceedings of the Star Chamber. The case which he puts, (and which is believed to be of rare occurrence,) where, during the examination of one witness in court, other witnesses are kept out to prevent their hearing him, will not bear him out; for, in that case, the party to be affected by the testimony is allowed to hear it, and may, during the progress of the trial, by cross-examination, or adducing other witnesses in his behalf, counteract its effect. The condition which Mr. Jackson would have imposed was, doubtless, founded upon the apprehension of an improper use being made by the claimants of the returns, so as to subject the British Government beyond its just responsibility. But it ought to be borne in mind that the definitive list of property for which indemnity was to be made, required by the convention, was given in to the Commissioners, and that the claimants, consequently, could make no addition of other property to it. The convention having stipulated the production of the returns without any conditions, it is hardly necessary to add that Mr. Cheves rejected those which Mr. Jackson had no authority from that instrument, and, it is believed, none from his Government, to propose. The returns were then produced and filed. The proceedings of the Board will show that Mr. Jackson persevered in rejecting every general and special application which was made in behalf of the claimants for a sight of them. Mr. Cheves then proposed that the Secretary of the Board should be directed to prepare a transcript of the returns to be transmitted to his Government to facilitate the discharge of his duty, and to afford to it an opportunity of seeing how far a compliance had been made with the stipulation of the third article. To this Mr. Jackson also objected, without some pledge or guaranty should be given to him that this Government would make no other use of the returns than such as he deemed proper. I put it to the candor of Mr. Canning to suppose a change of positions, and to ask himself what would have been his estimate of a demand of such a pledge or guaranty if it had been required at London by an American Commissioner? Mr. Cheves, it is useless to say, refused to be the organ of making such an affrontive proposal to his Government.

"It is painful to me to have been obliged to dwell so long upon the conduct of the British Commissioner. I might have greatly extended a list of the examples of his unaccommodating spirit, but those which I have selected must be sufficient to bring a conviction of it home to the British Government. It would have been much more agreeable to have seen in his official course here manifestations of that liberality, frankness, and mutual good feeling which happily characterize the subsisting relations, generally, of the two countries, and which it will be my constant purpose and pleasure to labor to increase.

"You cannot avoid remarking, in the scheme of the composition of this Board, the great difference in the relative situation of the parties, and the disadvantageous attitude in which the claimants are placed. The British Government is the party from which indemnity is expected for a large amount of property. The Government of the United States, in its corporate character, has no interest in the affair. It is to pay nothing; to receive nothing. It is the guardian only of the rights of its citizens, who are in the pursuit of that indemnity. If, when the two Commissioners are divided in opinion, the British Commissioner refuses the reference for which provision is made in the fifth article, that refusal is tantamount to a decision in favor of Great Britain. And if the refusal were extended to every case of division (and it really does not appear likely that there will be many of concurrence) the result would be that the object of the convention would be almost entirely defeated. Should the British Government sanction this course of proceeding of its Commissioner, which is not, however, to be supposed, it would turn out that one party absolutely made that decision which was to flow from the common consultations and joint judgment of both. We might, indeed, again invoke the friendly interposition of his Imperial Majesty, and he might again lend his friendly offices, and pronounce a new award. Out of this new award fresh questions might spring, dividing the judgments of the Commissioners, rendering further appeals to his umpirage necessary, and presenting a never-ending circle.

"From a commission so constituted and so executed, no practical benefit is likely to flow. It should be the mutual desire of both parties to be delivered from it. We have had reason to believe, from some former intimations, that the British Government is anxious to dispense with it by an agreement fixing upon some gross amount for all the indemnities which the convention promises. This is the only hypothesis upon which the course of Mr. Jackson is explicable. Believing that it is the interest of the claimants to make a reasonable compromise, you are requested to sound the British Government upon the subject, and if such an arrangement be attainable, you are authorized to make it. A power for that purpose accompanies these instructions.

"The difficulty is in fixing on a proper sum. We can only make an approximation, but even that will probably be nearer the justice of the case than any aggregate amount which may be expected to be awarded by the present or any other commission which would be created under the convention. The total number of slaves on the definitive list, to which the Board is now restricted, is 3,601, the details of which may be seen in the accompanying paper designated A. The aggregate sum of their values, estimated by the average price which has been agreed upon by the Board, is $1,183,200. Ten years' interest upon that sum, at six per cent. per annum, amounts to $709,920, giving, as the total of principal and interest, $1,893,120. The entire value of all personal property other than slaves, for which, as having been carried away, or destroyed, in contravention to the treaty of Ghent, claims have been laid before the Board, according to the best estimate which can be made, is $500,000. Ten years' interest upon that sum would be $300,000, making an aggregate, in principal and interest, of $800,000. The entire amount of the value of all property, including slaves, for which indemnity is claimed, and including interest, may be stated at $2,693,120. If, therefore, you could obtain that sum, every claimant might be fully compensated. But that can hardly be expected, and I will, therefore, endeavor to exhibit views of the deductions from that sum which would probably be made if the commission proceeds to fulfil its duties.

"1. As to the slaves. Of these, upwards of two thousand four hundred were carried away from the States of Virginia and Maryland, and, of this number, not more than five hundred will probably be brought, by the proof, within the terms of the treaty of Ghent. Of the residue of the 3,601, after deducting the 2,400, the principal part of them were taken from the States of Georgia and Louisiana, and all these are supposed to be comprehended in the provision of that treaty. The average values fixed by the Board were, for the slaves carried from Virginia and Maryland, $280 each; for Louisiana, $580 each; and for the other southern States, $390 each. The slave account, then, it may be conjectured, would probably stand thus:

"500 from Virginia and Maryland, at $280	$140,000
"250 from Louisiana, at $580	145,000
"900 from Georgia, &c., at $390	351,000
"Producing, together, a total sum, without interest, of	636,000

"2. As to the personal property other than slaves. The estimated value of all that is claimed is about $500,000. But many of these claims are clearly not within the terms of the treaty of Ghent. For example, a large item in the list (a copy of which, designated B, accompanies this letter) is for tobacco destroyed in 1814. However just it may have been to compensate the owners of that property for their loss, it is not provided for. It is believed that $250,000 principal may be assumed as large an amount as would be obtained for all the property other than slaves under the most liberal exercise of the powers of the Board. The aggregate amount, then, of the indemnity for every description of property which would probably be awarded by the commission may be safely assumed, it is believed, at $886,000, exclusive of interest. If to that sum be added ten years' interest, amounting to $531,600, the total of both principal and interest would be $1,417,600. A compromise, therefore, by which the British Government would agree to pay the sum of $1,417,600, would be deemed advisable. With respect to the question of interest, if the British Commissioner, in the event of the Board being again put in motion, should consent to refer it to the arbitrator, the reference could take place in every individual case, and the lot for arbitrator would be cast in each case. Upon the only supposition on which we can reason—that of an equality between the parties—in the result of that appeal to chance, it would turn out that the British choice of the arbitrator would prevail as often as the American; and we may safely conclude that as often as the British arbitrator had to decide upon the claim to interest it would be rejected. In conjecturing the amount of interest which may possibly be obtained, on the contingency of the progress of the Board, we must deduct one-half from the preceding estimate—that is, $265,800—which, being taken from the aggregate of $1,417,600, would leave $1,151,800 as the highest sum which it may be fairly presumed would be awarded by the commission if it be not abolished. This sum, therefore, of $1,151,800, you will consider, in treating, as the minimum to which you can fall. I observed in the estimates laid before Parliament for the British service of the present year, one of £250,000 sterling to cover the awards of the commission. This sum being very near the same as that to which you are limited, it is probable that they may have adopted some such process to arrive at it as I have employed, and it is, therefore, anticipated that you will have no difficulty in coming to the agreement with the British Government which you are now authorized to conclude.

"In the event of your being able to effect this arrangement, it would be proper to insert in the convention which you may conclude that the gross amount shall be distributed among the persons entitled to indemnity under the treaty of Ghent, and the award of his Imperial Majesty, and the convention signed at St. Petersburg, in pursuance of it, in such manner, by an American commission, as the Congress of the United States may by law direct. It would be well, also, to insert a clause declaring that, in the distribution thus to be made, the average value of the slaves which has been fixed by the Commissioners should govern, and that the commission should be restricted to the definitive list of slaves and other property which has been given in to the mixed commission, with such additions to it as ought to be equitably made, in consequence of omissions in the Department of State. This would simplify the duty to be performed, avoid the necessity of establishing the value of each particular slave, and prevent the uncertainty which would attend a new search after a just average. It would, likewise, be proper to provide in the convention that if the aggregate sum stipulated to be paid by Great Britain should fall short of the amount of claims to be ascertained by the American commission under the act of Congress, there should be a ratable deduction from the sum adjudged to each claimant. If, on the contrary, there should be an excess, that excess should be distributed by the same commission among such other owners of slaves and personal property carried away or destroyed by the British forces as Congress may direct.

"If you should be unable to come to any agreement to put an end to the present commission, by substituting, in lieu of it, a gross sum, to be apportioned among the claimants, you will then urge the British Government to infuse a better spirit into their Commissioner, and, especially, that they instruct him to execute the fifth article of the convention, according to its true intent and meaning, by referring to the arbitrator all the questions on which he and Mr. Cheves have disagreed. And, to prevent the delay which would arise from resorting again to the British Government, he ought to be charged with a similar reference of all other questions on which, from time to time, the Commissioners, during the future progress of the Board, may, unfortunately, happen to disagree.

"I am, with great respect, sir, your very humble and obedient servant,

"H. CLAY."

Letter from H. Clay to Albert Gallatin

No. 3.] DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, June 21, 1826.

SIR: In the general instructions which were directed from this Department, on the 10th May, 1825, to Mr. King, the then condition of the mixed commission appointed by the Governments of the United States and Great Britain, under the convention of 1822, to carry into effect the award of the Emperor of Russia, was fully stated, and Mr. King was required to urge the British Government to operate upon their Commissioner to give effect to the stipulations of the convention, and especially to the fifth article, which provides, in cases of disagreement between the Commissioners, for a reference to arbitration. He was also authorized to agree to compromise the whole affair by receiving a gross sum, and to dispense altogether with the commission. You will consider these instructions, as well as any others addressed to Mr. King, and which remain to be executed, (copies of all of which are furnished you,) as still in force, and applicable to your mission.

As soon as circumstances appear to have admitted after Mr. King's arrival in England, he called the attention of the British Government to that subject. A copy of the correspondence which passed between him and Mr. Canning is now placed in your possession. The result, finally, was a transfer of the negotiation from London to Washington. It was accordingly opened here with Mr. Vaughan, and what passed on the occasion will be seen by you in the several notes which were exchanged between him and this Department, of which copies are also now supplied you.

A perusal of the whole correspondence at London and in this city will show that it was of a nature far from being calculated to give satisfaction to this Government. Mr. Canning, after having invited Mr. King to state a specific sum which would meet the views of the United States in the way of compromise, which sum was, accordingly, promptly stated, contented himself with a laconic rejection of the amount, and, without bringing forward any counter proposal, abruptly and unexpectedly transferred the negotiation to Washington. Upon being informed of this transfer, a hope was indulged by the President that the just expectations which were so confidently cherished, in respect to the issue of Mr. King's application to the British Government for a faithful execution of the convention, would be, at last, realized through the agency of Mr. Vaughan at Washington. In this we have been entirely disappointed; and it has been seen, with no little surprise, that the only instruction with which the British plenipotentiary was charged by his Government was to communicate their approbation of Mr. Commissioner Jackson's disallowance of the claim to interest, as a part of the indemnity awarded by his Imperial Majesty, and his refusal to refer the disagreement between him and Mr. Cheves on that point to the arbitration expressly stipulated in the fifth article of the convention. The British Government did not even deign to communicate to this the reasons by which they had satisfied themselves, and which might, therefore, produce conviction here of the justness and propriety of Mr. Jackson's decisions in those two respects. We were told, indeed, by Mr. Vaughan that he was instructed to say that the law officers of the Crown entertained the opinion that there was no foundation for the demand of interest. What we had to do with the opinion of the law officers of the British Crown, that it should be brought forward in a diplomatic note addressed to this Government, was not stated. The British Government has the unquestionable right, if it think fit, to consult its law officers on any question, and their opinion may form, with that Government, a proper, or even deciding, consideration in making up its judgment, but it is entitled to have no influence with the Government of the United States beyond the force of the argument or the reasons brought forward to sustain it; and with these we have not been favored. The Government of the United States has every reason to hold in the highest estimation the opinions of its own law officer, but it is only in conformity to the example which has been set them by Great Britain that you are instructed to communicate that we also have consulted the Attorney General of the United States, our law officer, and that, after full examination and consideration, he has formed the opinion that the demand of interest is well founded, and consequently that, when the two Commissioners disagreed about the allowance of it, the British Commissioner was bound by the convention to have concurred in submitting the question to arbitration. A copy of Mr. Wirt's opinion accompanies these instructions, and you will make, during your negotiation, such use of it as may appear to you to be proper.

The question of interest was not the only question which it must have been known to the British Government, at the time the instructions to Mr. Vaughan were prepared, divided the two Commissioners. There were several others, one of which has an importance scarcely inferior to the question of interest. I allude to the disagreement between the Commissioners about the slaves of Louisiana taken away from Dauphin island. Yet his instructions were restricted to the sole question of interest, leaving all others to remain as so many impediments in the progressive execution of the commission. You will observe from my correspondence with Mr. Vaughan that I could extract from him the views of the British Government, neither in reference to those other questions, nor in regard to the principles which they meant to insist on as applicable to the fifth article of the convention. It is now more than a year since the disagreement arose between the Commissioners, which rendered necessary the appeal through Mr. King to the British Government to fufil its just engagements. If that circle of time be necessary to enable the British Government to decide only one of the various points of disagreement, it is evident, from the number of those which have arisen, and which may be anticipated, that the duration of the commission will be interminable, should the British Commissioner wait for the communication of the pleasure of his Government in each particular instance of disagreement between the Commissioners. It was under the apprehension of an indefinite and unreasonable prolongation of the commission that the instruction was dictated to Mr. King, to require from the British Government a direction to their Commissioner to refer all questions of difference between him and his colleague, arising under the convention, to the arbitration for which it provides.

The Commissioners, who were in vacation at the date of the instructions to Mr. King, resumed their sessions on the 8th day of December last, and continued them until the 10th day of the present month, when they again adjourned to meet on the 6th day of December next. A copy of their journal is now delivered to you, from which you will perceive that they have not made the smallest advance towards the completion of the business of the Board. There appeared to be no abatement of the unaccommodating spirit of Mr. Commissioner Jackson, upon which it was my disagreeable duty to animadvert in the instructions to Mr. King. He perseveres in his refusal to allow a reasonable access of the claimants to the evidence which the British Government was bound by the convention to produce; and, after the decision of the Board is pronounced on a question submitted by one of them to its consideration, hesitates, and has not yet decided to allow the claimants the small privilege of examining the journal of the proceedings of the Commissioners to ascertain the effect of the decision upon their interests. Mr. Cheves, in a letter addressed to this Department on the 12th instant, justly remarks that the late correspondence between the Commissioners affords "the most conclusive evidence of the hopelessness of this commission, unless some new impulse be given to it by the two Governments. Indeed, should all the points in difference between the Commissioners be settled by negotiation, it is morally certain, unless the British Commissioner shall be imbued with a new spirit, that new differences will immediately arise. There is not a hope of the execution of the convention in any way, unless unrestrained operation, in all possible cases, be given to the fifth article. Even then, from the structure of the convention, its results never can be satisfactory." This correspondence took place, as you will discover from the journal, after Mr. Cheves had yielded to the wish of the British Commissioner to make a new experiment to get along with the business of the Board—an experiment which he thought, and which it is evident, must be useless, as long as the British Commissioner continues to refuse to refer the question of interest, and other questions on which he disagrees with his associate, to arbitration; for, without the settlement of that question of interest, which applies to every case, it is altogether impracticable to decide any. It can be no longer doubted that the effect, if not the design, of the proceedings of the British Commissioner is to defeat, entirely, the commission, by first disagreeing, in all cases, with the American Commissioner, and then refusing, in every one, to call in the arbitrator of the convention. The President will not allow himself to believe that this conduct of its agent can be sanctioned by the British Government. The approbation of his refusal to refer the question of interest must have been hasty, and without due consideration.

However obviously it is the interest of both parties to put aside the commission, and to arrange, by a compromise founded on a spirit of mutual concession, a gross sum to be received in lieu of the awards of the Commissioners, you will forbear to make any proposal to that effect. After all that has yet occurred on that subject, both at London and Washington, this Government would be wanting in the respect which is due to itself if it submitted to the British Government any new proposal for a compromise. Should that Government think proper to offer any, you will receive and decide upon it according to your instructions. If they do not authorize you to agree to it, you will reject it, or, should you deem it worthy of consideration here, you will take it ad referendum.

But you will lose no time, on your arrival in England, in calling the attention of Mr. Canning to the state and prospects of the commission, and to urge that the British Government instruct their Commissioner to carry into effect the convention, by agreeing to refer all questions of disagreement whatever between the two Commissioners (including that of interest) to the arbitration of the convention. If that be refused, on the ground that the British Government has decided against the allowance of interest, you will then propose that the Commissioners shall proceed, under instructions to them, to refer all other questions of disagreement to the arbitration of the convention, with a reservation of the question of interest, to be left to the Emperor of Russia to decide whether it ought not to be referred to arbitration, according to the true intent and meaning of the award of his imperial brother, and the convention to carry it into effect. If they refuse to agree to instruct their Commissioner to refer all questions other than that of interest, and should insist upon excepting from reference that in regard to Dauphin island also, you are authorized to agree to the exception of that also, provided they consent that it shall be reserved and referred to the Emperor Nicholas in like manner with that of interest. You are furthermore authorized to propose a general submission to the Emperor Nicholas of all the questions in which Mr. Jackson has refused the arbitration for his decision upon each and all of them, whether they ought or ought not to have been left to arbitration. A power comprehending an authority to agree to such partial or general reference to the Emperor of Russia, and also to compromise the dispute, accompanies these instructions. Perhaps you will find it advisable to have a conference with Mr. Canning on this subject, in which, if you do not perceive a strong probability of an amicable and speedy settlement of the differences, you will address an official note to him, pointing out the instances in which the convention, and especially the fifth article, has been violated by Mr. Jackson, and demanding of the British Government to require of him to yield his co-operation in calling upon one of the arbitrators, in the manner specified in the fifth article, to decide all the cases on which he and his colleague have heretofore disagreed, or on which they may hereafter disagree.

In making this fresh appeal to the friendly offices of the Emperor of Russia the parties will not present themselves to his Imperial Majesty in a very favorable light. We would not concur in it but from necessity. Should it be agreed to, it will be requisite that no time should be lost in bringing the case before the Emperor, as the Commissioners will have to continue in office until his decision is known, in order to conform their proceedings to it.

Mr. Vaughan, in all probability, has long since communicated to his Government the correspondence which took place between him and this, and it is not unlikely that, before your arrival in England, instructions will have been despatched to him adapted to the state in which that correspondence left the business. It will be expedient, therefore, prior to your entering on this negotiation, to ascertain whether such instructions have been transmitted.

By the sixth article of our treaty with Great Britain of November, 1794, it was agreed to establish a Board, consisting of five members, to award the compensation which ought to be made to British creditors, in consequence of being prevented from recovering the amount due to them from American citizens by various lawful impediments created contrary to the treaty of peace. It so happened that a majority of the Board was composed of British subjects, and that majority laid down such sweeping principles for their government that the American members of the commission felt themselves constrained to secede from the sessions of the Board, or unjustly to lend themselves to the subjection of their Government to the payment of a most enormous sum not in the contemplation of the parties to the treaty. Their session became the subject of subsequent negotiation and a correspondence between the two Governments, extracts from which are herewith transmitted to you. They were not sent to Mr. King, because, being our minister at the Court of London with whom they took place, they were familiar to him. After much delay and discussion the two countries agreed, by the convention of 1802, (see 1st volume of the Laws, page 225,) as has been recently proposed, to dispense with the commission altogether, and that the United States should pay to Great Britain the gross sum of £600,000, in satisfaction and discharge of the money which they might have been liable to pay if the commission had proceeded.

It is remarkable how, in respect to analogous commissions, the position of the British Government being shifted, they would shift the principles which they contend as applicable to the case. Lord Grenville insisted, in substance, that the two Governments had no control over the commission; that the decisions of the Commissioners, in all cases, were binding, and that the Government of the United States had no right to object to them as exceeding the limits of the treaty; and he called upon the American Government to fulfil its stipulations, by requiring the attendance of their seceding Commissioners, or appointing others in their stead. If it be retorted that, the position of the American Government being also changed, we now bring forward principles different from those which we contended for on the occasion of the former commission, you will not admit the statement. Our great objection, in the execution of the former commission, was, that the Board laid down general rules of boundless operation, and attempted to decide cases by classes, and not, as they successively arose, according to the practice of the courts of both countries; and that the inevitable effect was to enlarge the powers of the commission, and to extend the liability of the United States beyond the plain stipulations of the treaty. The validity of this objection was admitted, at least by implication, by the British Government; for Mr. King states, in his despatch of the 22d April, 1800, that Lord Grenville expressed his opinion "that the new Board [it was proposed to create a new one] ought to proceed in a different manner from their predecessors, by deciding cases singly, one after another, instead of attempting to decide them by general resolves and in classes."

Contrary to the course recently pursued by Mr. Canning, Lord Grenville had no difficulty in stating a gross sum which the British Government might be willing to receive, in lieu of the amount to be awarded by the commission, if it proceeded, and, in the first instance, mentioned between one and two millions sterling, although, ultimately, only £600,000 was agreed upon; and this sum was finally fixed, after mutual propositions and such a comparison of opinions as is indispensable, in any case, to enable two parties, with conflicting interests and views, to conclude a satisfactory arrangement. Without further recalling a recollection of the circumstances by which that amicable result was attained, it is to be regretted that the example has been lost on the British Government, whose recent course has not been such as to allow of a similar, or any other, friendly issue of the present commission.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, sir, your obedient servant,

H. CLAY.

ALBERT GALLATIN, appointed Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary to London.

Extract of a letter from Mr. Clay to Mr. Gallatin.

"Mr. Vaughan also addressed a note to this Department, under date of the 20th ultimo, of which a copy is herewith, in regard to the non-execution of the St. Petersburg convention. The answer to it, of which a copy is also transmitted, will put you in possession of the views of the President on the two points to which Mr. Vaughan's note refers. These views you will use, and strengthen and enforce by such additional observations as may occur to you, in your discussions with the British Government. In regard to the question relating to Dauphin island, the manner in which that Government expresses itself authorized the supposition that it might labor under a mistake in believing our title to the island to be derived from the Florida treaty of 1819, instead of that of Louisiana of 1803. It was thought, therefore, expedient to assume the existence of such a mistake, which would afford to the British Government an opportunity of a decent retreat from untenable ground. The treaty of Ghent renders unnecessary any consideration of the question of our title; the fact of possession, by the terms of the first article, and the reduction of it by the British forces, being sufficient to entitle us, first, to its restoration, and, secondly, to indemnity for the slaves taken away from it. After all that has occurred, both with Spain and with Great Britain, if the claim to compensation for those slaves should continue to be resisted upon the ground which has been assumed, there can be no difficulty in comprehending the real motive which actuates the British Government.

"I am your obedient servant, H. CLAY.

"ALBERT GALLATIN,

Letter from H. Clay to Albert Gallatin.

No. 10.] DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, October 21, 1826.

SIR: Your despatch, No. 9, under date of the 13th day of September last, has been received, in which you intimate the propriety of an enlargement of your instructions, so as to admit of a compromise with the British Government of the slave convention, by accepting two hundred and fifty thousand pounds, if a larger sum be unattainable. Considering the impracticability of the existing Board, and the little prospect which it holds out of a speedy and satisfactory decision of the claims presented for its consideration, and confiding in your discretion, the President authorizes you to consent to receive that sum, if no larger can be obtained. You will, of course, not agree to it until you shall have exhausted all reasonable efforts to obtain more favorable terms. It will be better that it should be made payable in England, and you are also authorized to agree to receive it at the times suggested in your previous despatch, if shorter periods of payment should be declined.

I am, with great respect, your obedient servant, H. CLAY.

ALBERT GALLATIN, Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States, London.

To the Senate of the United States:

In the message to both Houses of Congress at the commencement of their present session it was intimated that the commission for liquidating the claims of our fellow-citizens to indemnity for slaves and other property carried away after the close of the late war with Great Britain, in contravention to the first article of the treaty of Ghent, had been sitting in this city with doubtful prospects of success, but that propositions had recently passed between the two Governments which it was hoped would lead to a satisfactory adjustment of that controversy.

I now transmit to the Senate, for their constitutional consideration and advice, a convention signed at London by the plenipotentiaries of the two Governments on the 13th of the last month relating to this object. A copy of the convention is at the same time sent, together with a copy of the instructions under which it was negotiated, and the correspondence relating to it.

To avoid all delay these documents are now transmitted, consisting chiefly of original papers, the return of which is requested.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

WASHINGTON, December 20, 1826.

Albert Gallatin, Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary, to Henry Clay, Secretary of State.

No. 4.] LONDON, August 19, 1826.

SIR: I had my first interview with Mr. Canning at the Foreign Office on the 17th instant. He said, on my giving him the copy of my letters of credence, that he expected that the King would be in town on the beginning of next month, when I would have an audience, and that any unforeseen delay in that respect would in no degree affect the exercise of my diplomatic functions or retard the negotiations with which I was charged.

After some general and friendly conversation, I stated that I was specially instructed to call as soon as possible his attention to the proceedings of the commission appointed in pursuance of the St. Petersburg convention of 1822.

Acquiescing in the opinion expressed on a former occasion by Mr. Canning, that the questions arising out of the convention were not in themselves, at least in this stage of the business, a proper subject of discussion between the two Governments, I said that we did not complain that the British Commissioner should, on any such question, have differed in opinion from the American Commissioner, but of his having uniformly refused, whenever such difference had taken place, to refer the question to the arbitrator in the manner provided for by the convention. That gentleman had thereby assumed the exclusive and unwarrantable authority of deciding alone on every question on which there was a disagreement between him and his colleague. It was impossible that the Government of the United States should submit to such an assumption. Our complaint was, that the convention was not executed; our application to the British Government would be that, the non-execution arising from the act of their Commissioner, positive instructions should be given to him to agree to a reference of every case or question coming before the commission where, not being able to agree, such reference was asked by the American Commissioner. To resort to the pretence that the points on which the reference had been refused were not questions arising out of the convention, was still deciding what was in question, that it was the province of the arbitrator to decide. In point of fact, all the questions on which the reference had been refused must be admitted to have been intimately connected with the subject—to have necessarily arisen from the nature of the claims under consideration.

Without either denying or admitting the correctness of those observations, Mr. Canning said that he had not been aware that the British Commissioner had refused to refer in any other case than that of interest; and on that question he acknowledged that much might be said on both sides. He asked whether there was no remedy provided by the convention for such occurrence as we complained of; and he inquired particularly whether Mr. King had not been, and whether I was not, authorized to settle the whole subject by a compromise. I answered, that there were not only other questions besides that of interest which the British Commissioner had refused to refer, but that, although I had not yet sufficiently investigated all the proceedings and papers, I believed that there was not a single instance in which the reference, when asked by his colleagues, had not been refused by him. That such reference was the only remedy provided by the convention was evident; and here I took the opportunity, but without expressly applying the observation to the non-execution of the convention, to express how preferable it appeared to my Government that every subject of difference between the two countries should be settled amongst themselves, rather than to apply to the decision of a third Power; an observation to which Mr. Canning fully assented.

As to a compromise, I said that Mr. King had undoubtedly been, and that I still was, authorized to agree to a reasonable one as a substitute for the convention. But as Mr. Canning had simply rejected as inadmissible the proposal which Mr. King had been invited to make on that subject without making any counter offer on his part, any overtures of that kind must now come from the British Government. If made, I would be ready to receive and discuss it; but I would make none myself. All I had to ask was, that efficient measures should be speedily adopted by the British Government for the bona fide execution of the convention.

Mr. Canning said that the reason why he had not accompanied his rejection of Mr. King's proposal with any explanation was, that, in his view of the subject, that proposal was not founded on the principles of a compromise. It had appeared to his Majesty's Government that the sum asked was equal to the whole amount of the claims filed, including the interest on the whole, and for the whole period. This was a matter of detail which I was not willing, and which I said I was not prepared to discuss.

In the course of the conversation, which was more desultory than it appears here, Mr. Canning recurred several times to the subject of compromise, and my answer was always substantially the same. He finally said that the ministers would re-assemble on the 1st of September, and that they would then determine on the best course to be pursued on that subject. That he would prefer a compromise to enforcing the convention may be fairly inferred. But I have not sufficient data from what fell from him to judge of the probability of his making such an offer as may be accepted. I did not fail to urge every reason there was, independent of those derived from the justice of our claim, for putting an end to the interminable delays which had already occurred. That sea officers should have carried away slaves to whom they had given an asylum might be understood; but then there ought to have been no hesitation on the part of the British Government to have made immediate compensation. If the number carried away was much greater than could possibly have been anticipated by them, it must have arisen from some omission or want of precision in the orders transmitted to their naval commanders when peace was announced to them. That after a refusal to indemnify, and reference to a third Power—that after a delay of eight years arising from those causes, and a decision supposed to be final had been obtained, new impediments should again be thrown in the way, had been wholly unexpected. In a matter of private claims, deemed to have been secured by three distinct treaties or conventions, and affecting the interests of many individuals, Mr. Canning must be sensible that such delays, almost amounting to a denial of justice, must have created a strong sensation. And there was a circumstance which he had, perhaps, forgotten, and which I would beg leave to remind him of, as having necessarily increased the displeasure felt on the present occasion. A stipulation, similar to that of the treaty of peace of 1814, had already been introduced in that of 1783, and it had been equally disregarded. This had been a cause or a pretence for the alledged non-fulfilment on our part of certain stipulations respecting the payment of British debts, and both had been followed by ten years of mutual recriminations and increased difficulties. But though most of these had then been settled, no indemnity had to this day been made for the slaves that had been carried away contrary to the provisions of the treaty of 1783. The effect of a renewed disregard of a similar stipulation, and affecting the same part of the country, would be easily understood, and required no comment.

I have the honor to be, respectfully, sir, your most obedient servant,

ALBERT GALLATIN.

Mr. Gallatin to Mr. Clay.

No. 7.] LONDON, September 12, 1826.

SIR: I stated in my last despatch that I was in hopes, in my next conference with Mr. Canning, to ascertain what would be the proper course to pursue on the subject of the proceedings of the commission under the St. Petersburg convention.

Previous to the day appointed for that interview (the 7th instant) he wrote me a note postponing it, on account of Mr. Huskisson's indisposition, to the 11th, and informing me at the same time that he would leave this city for Paris on this day.

On receiving this information, and seeing there would be no time left between the conference and his departure, I determined to forego the advantage which might be derived from a previous conversation, and to try at once to bring him to a point by stating officially those grounds of complaint which I had already mentioned, verbally, on my first conference of the 17th of August. Indeed, I thought it the best if not the only mode of ascertaining what were his real intentions, and whether he had or had not transferred the discussion to Washington.

You will perceive that in that note, dated the 6th instant, and of which a copy is enclosed, I confined myself strictly to the question of right, viz: that of a reference to an arbitrator in all cases where it was asked by the American Commissioner; * * * only alluding to the ultimate remedy which might be sought for by appealing to the Emperor of Russia, and carefully avoiding, in that respect, whatever might have the appearance of a threat. To that note I received, on the evening of the 10th, the answer dated the 9th, of which a copy is also enclosed. Yesterday, the 11th, I went, according to the appointment, to the Foreign Office, where I found both Mr. Canning and Mr. Huskisson. Mr. Canning immediately alluded to his note, and gave some explanation of it. I told him that the only object of my Government was to bring the discussion on that subject to a favorable issue as speedily as possible, and that if its transfer to Washington was calculated to attain that end, and not to produce unnecessary delays, they would be perfectly satisfied with that course. But as I was unacquainted with the nature of that despatch, the contents of which Mr. Vaughan was authorized to communicate to the Secretary of State, and with the extent of the discretionary powers with which he (Mr. Vaughan) had been intrusted on that occasion, it was utterly impossible for me to decide whether it was proper or not to suspend the discussion here until an answer had been received from Washington, and that in that respect I must abide by his decision.

I hardly need observe that, as Mr. Canning was leaving town the next day for France with an intention of being absent about six weeks, and as the discussion must in the meanwhile, at all events, cease, it was wholly immaterial whether it should for the present be formally considered as suspended or not.

Although Mr. Canning did not state what were the instructions given to Mr. Vaughan, I infer from the general tenor of the conversation which took place that they are not such as will lead to any result, and that your first despatch will give me such information as will enable me to resume the discussion by the time Mr. Canning returns.

The only important observations that fell from him were, that the right of reference could not be admitted generally; that there were substantial reasons for denying it on the question of interest, and that if admitted in that case, the result would be unequal and unjust on account of the contradictory decisions that would take place, according to the arbitrator on whom the lot might fall. He then said that the view taken of that subject by the British Government was, that the Commissioners should proceed in the examination of the claims, reserving the question of interest to be afterwards discussed between the two Governments, who would then be better able to judge of what ought or might be done on that point.

I will not trouble you with the arguments I adduced in reply to his general observations, and which are already familiar to you; but I declared explicitly that we could not agree to the course he proposed, and on which the British Commissioner had already insisted. The remedy provided by the convention in cases of disagreement between the two Commissioners might be defective, inconvenient, and unequal in its operation; but there was no other provided, and to that we must adhere. To agree to the postponement of the question of interest in the manner proposed would be an abandonment on our part of the right the convention gave us to refer, and leave us afterwards without any remedy but the uncertain result of the negotiation.

The turn the conversation took led again to the expedient of arranging the difference by compromise. I repeated what, in reply to Mr. Canning's question, I had stated in our first conference, that I had powers on that subject, as on all others, but that Mr. King's offer having been rejected without any being made on the part of Great Britain, I was not authorized to make another, but would be ready to receive and discuss any that Mr. Canning might be disposed to make. He made me repeat what I had said, and observed that he had not understood me precisely at our first interview.

My belief is, that there is a great reluctance in receding from the ground they have already taken in supporting Mr. Jackson, and that there is a disposition to compromise.

The remainder of what passed at that conference, as it relates to other subjects, will be stated in a distinct despatch.

I have the honor to be, respectfully, sir, your obedient servant,

ALBERT GALLATIN.

Hon. HENRY CLAY, Secretary of State.

Mr. Canning to Mr. Gallatin.

FOREIGN OFFICE, September 9, 1826.

The undersigned, his Majesty's principal Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, has the honor to acknowledge the receipt of the note of Mr. Gallatin, Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary from the United States, dated the 6th instant, relating to the proceedings of the commission appointed under the convention of St. Petersburg of the 12th of July, 1822.

Upon comparing that note with the copy, transmitted to the undersigned by his Majesty's Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary in the United States, of a letter addressed to that minister on the 15th of April last by the American Secretary of State, the undersigned is inclined to believe that, had Mr. Gallatin been apprised that Mr. Clay's letter had been so communicated to the undersigned, and that an answer had been sent to Mr. Vaughan's despatch, the substance of which answer is to be communicated to Mr. Clay, Mr. Gallatin would have suspended for the present any further proceeding upon the same subject.

The undersigned had not the dates of this correspondence present to his mind at the time when he had first the honor of seeing Mr. Gallatin, and he was not aware, therefore, that what Mr. Gallatin might have to say to him upon the subject of the commission could not arise out of that correspondence.

Upon reference to the archives, he finds that Mr. Vaughan's despatch, enclosing the copy of Mr. Clay's letter, not having been received here till the 27th of May, the answer to it, which bears date the 13th of June, cannot have reached America before Mr. Gallatin set sail for England.

The undersigned would therefore submit to Mr. Gallatin whether there can be any advantage in carrying on simultaneously two discussions on the same subject—the one through his Majesty's envoy in the United States, the other between Mr. Gallatin and the undersigned.

The undersigned only thinks it necessary here to repeat the assurance, which Mr. Vaughan is instructed to give to Mr. Clay, that the British Government is earnestly desirous of seeing the business of the commission brought to a speedy and satisfactory termination.

The undersigned requests Mr. Gallatin to accept the assurance of his high consideration.

GEORGE CANNING.

ALBERT GALLATIN, Esq.

Mr. Gallatin to Mr. Canning.

62 UPPER SEYMOUR STREET, September 6, 1826.

The undersigned, envoy of the United States of America, has been specially charged by his Government to make the following representation to Mr. Canning, his Majesty's principal Secretary for Foreign Affairs, respecting the proceedings of the commission appointed in conformity with the convention of St. Petersburg of the 12th of July, 1822.

It is not intended by the Government of the United States that a discussion should take place between the two Governments on the merits of any particular case, or of any question growing out of the convention, on which the Commissioners may have disagreed. The ground of complaint is, that when such disagreement has unfortunately taken place, the British Commissioner has uniformly refused the reference contemplated by the fifth article of the convention. Such disagreement has happened with respect to questions relative to evidence, to interest, to the definitive list, and to the territory where private property had been carried away. The proof and the effect of this uniform refusal are conspicuous in the fact that to this day not a single case or question has been referred to an arbitrator under the article aforesaid. The reason assigned has been that, in the opinion of the British Commissioner, none of the questions alluded to resulted from the stipulations of the convention. This, in every case, was precisely the subject of disagreement. To refuse to refer has, in every case, been to assume what was in question. He first, as Commissioner, rejects a claim or decides against a question because, in his opinion, it is not embraced by the convention; and then refusing, for the very same reason, to refer, he makes his own decision conclusive, and constitutes himself in every such instance the sole judge of the case. This cannot be considered but as defeating altogether the object of the convention, which has provided no other remedy for any possible difference of opinion between the Commissioners but the reference to an arbitrator.

As to any argument drawn from the possibility of extreme cases, it is sufficient to observe that it is precisely as possible that the British Commissioner should refuse to refer cases clearly embraced by the convention, as that the American Commissioner should propose to refer cases clearly not comprehended by that instrument; and that, in point of fact, all the questions on which a disagreement has actually happened were such as, whether embraced or not by the convention, were at all courts intimately connected with the nature of the claims and grew out of their consideration.

To judge from the past there would seem to be no limit to the number of cases or questions on which the two Commissioners may differ. To what extent the course heretofore pursued by the British Commissioner will be carried is unknown; but it is evident that the Government of the United States cannot acquiesce in that assumed interpretation of the convention which makes him the exclusive judge of every question.

On one occasion already has an explanation of the award of the Emperor of Russia been asked and given. To renew similar applications relative to the true meaning of that decision, or of the convention concluded under his mediation, for the purpose of carrying that award into effect, would, to the United States at least, be most unpleasant.

It is their earnest wish that every subject of difference between the two countries should be adjusted by amicable arrangements and among themselves. This course they sincerely believe to be far better calculated to preserve and promote harmony and friendly relations, and in every respect preferable to a reference to a third Power.

The undersigned has accordingly been instructed to lay the facts above stated before his Majesty's Government, in full confidence that a complaint so entirely founded in justice will be redressed, and that a proper and efficient remedy will be applied. To infuse a new and more accommodating spirit would be highly useful. What the Government of the United States think they have a strict right to ask is, that in order to give its true and full effect to the convention the British Commissioner shall be instructed to assent to the reference contemplated by the fifth article in all the cases and upon all the questions on which a disagreement has already taken place, or may hereafter happen between the two Commissioners, whenever such reference is asked by his colleague.

The undersigned requests Mr. Canning to accept the reiterated assurance of his highest consideration.

ALBERT GALLATIN.

Mr. Gallatin to Mr. Clay.

No. 9.] LONDON, September 13, 1826.

SIR: Private information, received since my despatch No. — of yesterday, authorizes me to say that this Government is disposed to offer £250,000 in lieu of the indemnity which might be obtained by virtue of the St. Petersburg convention, the payment to be made by instalments, the first of which not before April or May next, and the last not later than April or May, 1828.

Although, in that case, every effort will be made to demonstrate the justice of a more adequate compensation, and to obtain it, I am of opinion that the attempt will be useless. There is, as far as I can judge, a settled determination not to apply to Parliament for any additional appropriation. It is clear that the conduct of the naval officers who carried away the slaves might have been prevented if positive and explicit orders had been sent to them at the time. One of them is now one of the Lords of the Admiralty. The clause in the Ghent treaty would also be represented as improvident, and as a proof of incapacity on the part of the British plenipotentiaries; and a discussion on the reference to the Emperor of Russia, and on his decision, would be unpleasant to the ministry.

I make these observations in anticipation, and before I can announce that the proposal has been officially made, because, if I am right in my view of the subject, the sum in question, though coming very near, may fall somewhat short of the minimum prescribed by the instructions.

Your estimate of that minimum is—

Claims that will be admitted—principal	$886,000
Ten years' interest, at 6 per cent., $531,600, one-half of which, according to the chances of reference, would be obtained under the convention	265,800
Total	1,151,800

But one year has elapsed since you made the estimate, and I apprehend that you calculated the interest to the time when you wrote, and not with reference to that when the payments would be made. Calculating the interest from May 1, 1815, to May 1, 1827, is twelve years instead of ten, and, taking the half of it, is 36 instead of 30 per cent. on the principal.

The estimate thus corrected would be—

Principal	$886,000
Twelve years' interest, at 6 per cent., $637,920, one-half of which is	318,960
Estimated interest on instalments subsequent to May 1, 1827	28,040
Total	1,233,000

Which last sum appears to me to be the true minimum, as prescribed by the spirit of the instructions.

This sum of $1,233,000, calculated at what is erroneously called par—that is to say, at 4*s.* 6*d.* sterling per dollar—is equal to £277,425.

Calculated at 4*s.* 2½*d.* per dollar, which is its true value, it would be equal to about £259,443.

Supposing the exchange to continue as it is, viz: 10 per cent. below the nominal par, the said $1,233,000 would be procured in America for bills on London amounting to a fraction less than £250,000, or on an average three months earlier than the dates on which the payment of the instalments has been calculated.

On this last supposition, therefore, the sum proposed would cover the minimum as calculated by me; and it is wholly improbable that the exchange will fall below the real par, at which rate (4*s.* 2½*d.* per dollar, or 7 per cent. below the nominal par) the £250,000 would produce about $1,188,000, perhaps received about three months earlier than calculated.

This, to be sure, is but a trifle below the sum prescribed; yet, as the fact whether the £250,000 will actually cover the sum or minimum depends on a contingency, viz: the rate of exchange at the time, I request to be informed immediately whether, if nothing better can be obtained, I am authorized to accept it. It would not be worth while to refer, for that purpose, the whole case to Washington, and, in truth, I do not believe that I will have it in my power to do it, or that the proposal will be officially made to me until after it shall have been ascertained that it will be accepted.

I have the honor to be, respectfully, sir, your most obedient servant,

ALBERT GALLATIN

Hon. HENRY CLAY, Secretary of State, Washington.

Mr. Gallatin to the Secretary of State.

No. 11.] LONDON, September 16, 1826.

SIR: I have the honor to enclose copy of my answer of this day to Mr. Canning's note of the 9th instant relative to the slave commission. Independent of the reasons already mentioned, I was the more inclined to make no objection to the suspension of the discussion for the present, on account of the unofficial proposal of compromise.

The more I have reflected on this the more I feel satisfied of the propriety of acceding to it, and of the improbability of obtaining better terms.

Amongst other considerations, I will observe that your estimate, founded on the information received from the American Commissioner, has for basis the chance of what we could get under the convention, supposing this Government to accede to our demands that the British Commissioner should refer, in every case, when required by his colleague so to do. Mr. Cheves, in his calculation, has made no deduction from the amount claimed for the Georgia and Louisiana slaves. He believes that the proofs will be sufficient with respect to all of them; but, considering his colleague's temper, it cannot be doubted, especially if instructed to refer, as above stated, that he will be still more difficult, and ask himself, for a reference in numerous cases where the proof shall have appeared satisfactory to Mr. Cheves. In all such cases our chance is but one-half of the claim, and it is already certain that we must abide by that chance as respects the Louisiana slaves, the reference having been asked in that case by our Commissioner.

This item alone amounts to £32,000, making a deduction of £16,000 in the estimate, on the same principle on which it has been calculated.

I have the honor to be, respectfully, sir, your most obedient servant,

ALBERT GALLATIN.

Hon. HENRY CLAY, Secretary of State.

Mr. Gallatin to Mr. Canning.

UPPER SEYMOUR STREET, September 16, 1826.

The undersigned, Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States, had the honor to receive the note of Mr. Canning, his Majesty's principal Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, dated the 9th instant, and written in answer to the note of the undersigned of the 6th, relating to the proceedings of the commission appointed under the convention of St. Petersburg of the 12th of July, 1822.

The object of both Governments is to avoid unnecessary delays, and to bring the business of the commission to a speedy and satisfactory termination. Whether this will be accelerated by the transfer of the discussion to America depends on the nature and extent of the powers of Mr. Vaughan in that respect. The undersigned, being unacquainted with these, and unable to form an opinion on the subject, abides by that of Mr. Canning. He does it the more cheerfully as, by comparing dates, it appears that information of the result at Washington may be expected by the time when the discussion can, if necessary, be renewed with convenience in this country.

The undersigned requests Mr. Canning to accept the assurance of his high consideration.

ALBERT GALLATIN.

Right Honorable GEORGE CANNING, &c., &c., &c.

Mr. Gallatin to Mr. Clay.

No. 18.] LONDON, November 4, 1826.

SIR: Mr. Canning having returned to London two days ago, I lost no time in asking an interview, which took place yesterday. I ultimately proposed to accept £270,000 as an indemnity for the slaves and other property carried away contrary to the stipulations of the treaty of Ghent, the additional £20,000 which I asked to make part of the last instalment. To this proposal he was not prepared or disposed to accede, and said he must have time to consider it.

You will perceive, by reference to my former letter, and by making the calculations, that the £250,000 offered are equivalent, at the exchange of 10 per cent. below the nominal, or about 4 per cent. below the real par, to the minimum contemplated by the instructions, adding two years' half interest thereto; and, as this has been the average exchange for the last twelve months, I intend to accept that sum if Mr. Canning refuses to accede to my proposal. There are other reasons for it, which have been mentioned in my former despatch on this subject.

I pray you to recollect that all that has heretofore passed respecting compromise has been confidential and unofficial, and with the understanding that, in case we should not agree, nothing that had taken place should be published, or considered as affecting the rights of either party.

I have the honor to be, respectfully, sir, your most obedient and very humble servant,

ALBERT GALLATIN.

Hon. HENRY CLAY, Secretary of State, Washington.

Mr. Gallatin to Mr. Clay.

[Confidential.]

No. 22.] LONDON, November 11, 1826.

SIR: The informal offer of £250,000 in lieu of the sums which Great Britain might be liable to pay as indemnity and compensation for the slaves and other private property carried away in contravention of the 1st article of the treaty of Ghent was founded on the following basis, viz:

Claims admitted by both Commissioners		£140,000
Claims doubtful, on which reference under the convention would be asked	£80,000
And which, the chances of the arbitrator's decision being equal, would be reduced to one-half		40,000
Making the probable amount of principal that would be allowed under the convention		180,000
The chance of the interest being also equal, one-half of it only should be added to the principal; and as the American rate of interest was 6, and the British 5 per cent., this question would also be referred; the rate of interest must therefore be taken at 5½, one-half of which was 2¾ per cent. for 12 years		59,400
Total		239,400

The difference between which and the £250,000 offered would more than cover the interest on the deferred instalments.

In my informal answer given on the 3d instant I admitted that though, in justice, the whole interest was due to the claimants, yet, taking into consideration the chances of a reference under the convention, the reduction of the interest to one-half was a proper basis of compromise. But I objected to the British rate of interest being assumed as one of the elements of the calculation, since the damages arising from delay had been sustained in America. As related to the principal, admitting, also, the reduction to one-half of the claims which might be referred as doubtful, I said that claims to the amount of two hundred thousand pounds were considered by the American Commissioner as indisputable; and about sixty thousand pounds might be considered as doubtful, either for want of legal proof or for other reasons. Even supposing that the British Commissioner should raise objections against all the claims, £140,000 only excepted, I could not estimate the principal that probably would be allowed under the convention at less than..... £200,000

The twelve years' interest, at 3 per cent. on which, being..... 72,000

Would make the total amount, if paid on May 1, 1827..... 272,000

But if the payments were made in London on the drafts of the Treasurer of the United States, I would take £270,000 in three instalments, at the same dates which had been offered, viz: £100,000 on 1st May next, £100,000 on 1st November ensuing, and £70,000, instead of the £50,000 offered, on May 1, 1828.

Mr. Canning invited me to an official conference at the Foreign Office for the 9th instant, at which Messrs. Huskisson and Addington, the plenipotentiaries appointed to treat with me, also attended. After some preliminary observations on the informal communications which had taken place, and having stated that all the claims having been made in dollars, any agreement we might make for a gross sum in lieu thereof must be expressed in the same currency, they offered, as the highest sum which, after a thorough investigation, they could give, twelve hundred thousand dollars.

I stated that, as related to the informal proposals, mine was expressed in pounds because that of Mr. Canning was in that currency; that from my having asked that the payments should be in London, it was clear that I had taken the rate of exchange into consideration, not indeed at its present high rates, on which I could not rely, since the payments were offered at six, twelve, and eighteen months from this date, but at that which I considered the true par, or at about 5½ per cent. above the nominal par, and that my proposal of £270,000, payable in three instalments, was founded on that basis. Now that a formal offer of $1,200,000 was made, and in the shape of an ultimatum, I would give mine, from which I could not recede, as it was the minimum prescribed in my instructions. It would be $1,204,960, payable on the 1st of May, 1827, with interest at the rate of six per cent. a year on any portion of that sum, the payment of which should be made subsequent to that day. As to the sum itself, I expressed my regret to be compelled to ask the amount in addition to that offered in round numbers, but in every instruction there must be some limit, and the amount of interest produced that fractional sum. You will recollect that the minimum prescribed in the instructions to my predecessors, and to which I was referred, was $886,000 principal; the rate of interest was fixed at 3 per cent., and that there would be next spring 12 years of interest. The 1st of May, 1815, had been agreed on as the time from which it should commence.

My proposal was ultimately agreed to, but as the British plenipotentiaries had not yet the necessary information of the time when the payments would suit the convenience of the Treasury, the amount and dates of the instalments were left undecided for the moment, and we proceeded to arrange the details of the convention, to which I will hereafter advert. Most of them having been arranged, as I had come prepared with a draft of a convention, it was agreed that I should leave it with the British plenipotentiaries, and that after having made the alterations in conformity with what we had agreed on, they should send me the next day a new draft for my inspection, and that we should again meet this day at the Foreign Office in order to conclude.

The draft was accordingly sent to me yesterday by Mr. Addington, and having made in the margin several necessary alterations, I was ready to return, it when I received a private note from him, intimating that Mr. Canning considered it as indispensible that the ratifications should be exchanged in London; that an article to that effect was therefore sent to me, and also an alteration in the article which provided for the instalments, they being now made to depend on the date of that exchange, instead of fixing the precise days on which they should be paid. In my original draft, Washington was designated as the place for exchanging the ratifications. In that first prepared by Mr. Addington and sent to me there was no article providing for the exchange, and the dates and amount of instalments were still left in blank.

The reason for making London the place where the ratifications should be exchanged was sufficiently obvious; it was a subject not proper for discussion, at least on my part; and in the sequal Mr. Canning avoided to approach it. On principle I could not object to it, since the right of selecting the place where to exchange the ratifications was equal on both sides; and Washington having in general been the place heretofore agreed on, London might now be asked on the ground of reciprocity.

I answered Mr. Addington, also, in a private note, avoiding to make the question one of right, or in itself of any importance, but stating merely the inconveniences that would arise from the uncertainty of the times of the payment, and from the delay in the adjustment of claims, since the convention would not be laid before Congress till ratified by both parties. I added that I would call at the Foreign Office at 3 o'clock, in order to try to obviate the difficulty, if Mr. Canning should be disengaged, and could receive me.

When I called I found there was a Cabinet council, but Mr. Addington to receive me. I proposed to him that the payment of the first instalment should be postponed until the 1st of November, interest being paid on it to that date from the 1st of May. This he thought would be inadmissible, as they were limited, as well as myself, as to the gross sum to be paid, and would not swell it with additional interest. In saying this he alluded, undoubtedly, to the great reluctance of exceeding the estimate for that object which had been laid before Parliament. He carried, however, my proposal to Mr. Canning, and returned after awhile with a proposition intended, as he said, to obviate, as far as practicable, the inconvenience complained of. It was, that half the money should be paid after the ratification of the convention by the President, but without waiting for that of the King. This would give us a sufficient pledge, if any indeed was wanting, that his ratification would certainly follow that of the President. The second instalment they would pay on the 1st of August, which was as long after the 1st of May as the probable time which would elapse between the payment of the first instalment and the last mentioned day, so as to make both together tantamount to a payment of the whole on the 1st of May, and therefore without interest. As they were ready to pay the money, they could not take into consideration the delay which might arise on account of the early adjournment of Congress; but they presumed that the anticipated payment of the first half might also facilitate an anticipated provision on our part for the adjustment of the claims. The proposition, considered without reference to this last point, but only as connected with that of exchanging the ratifications in London, appeared to me sufficient, and I accordingly accepted it. In a conference which took place the same afternoon, after the council had been dissolved, with the British plenipotentiaries and Mr. Canning, the few details not yet arranged were adjusted; but in order to have time for transcribing four fair copies of the convention, the next meeting was postponed to Monday the 13th instant.

In arranging the details, the object of the British plenipotentiaries was to be fully discharged, not only from any demand on account of the claims, but also from any species of responsibility as to the manner in which these claims might be adjusted and paid. This they said belonged exclusively to the United States; and they rejected altogether the clause I proposed, that if the sum paid by Great Britain should fall short of the principal of the claims allowed, there should be a ratable deduction from such claims respectively, and that if there was a surplus it should be distributed in the same proportion among the claimants. I stated that, exclusive of the wish to facilitate the labors of the new American commission which must be appointed to adjust the claims, the compromise being founded on the estimate of their amount, and this again on the valuation of the slaves as already fixed by the present commission, and on the total amount of the claims presented to it, it was necessary that those two bases should be preserved. For that purpose it was agreed that, in annulling the convention of St. Petersburg, the second article, which provides for the valuation of slaves, should be preserved as having been already executed, and that so much of the third article as related to the definitive list, and had already been executed, should also be preserved; leaving no question open, in that respect, but that of the claims not included in the definitive list on account of omissions in the Department of State, on which particular question the Commissioners had not made a decision. The sum to be paid by Great Britain was defined to be "for the use of the persons entitled to indemnification and compensation by virtue of the decision of the Emperor of Russia and of the convention of St. Petersburg," so as to make that decision and convention the rules which must govern the proceedings of the new commission. The British plenipotentiaries refused to enter into any other stipulations as to the manner in which the United States should direct the adjustment and payment of the claims to be made, and a clause was inserted at their request, "that the British Government should have no further concern or liability on that subject," in order to avoid a possibility of an appeal to Great Britain, as party to the convention, by any claimant who might complain that the decision of the United States in his case was not in conformity with the provisions of the convention.

I think that Mr. Canning was sensible from the beginning that our right to a reference in all cases under the St. Petersburg convention was well founded, and that the embarrassment arising from the ground assumed, perhaps without sufficient consideration on that question, and the inconvenience of an appeal to the Emperor of Russia, were strong motives for making a compromise. He also appeared struck with an observation I made at one of our interviews: that a similar provision to that of the 1st article of the treaty of Ghent had been inserted in the treaty of peace of 1783; that slaves had, in contravention thereto, been also carried away, and for whom, to this day, no compensation had ever been made, and that a repetition of the same injury, in relation to the same species of property, and affecting the same part of the country, had a most unfavorable aspect. I believe, also, that, satisfied that the steps taken here on the subject of the colonial intercourse would be considered as not of a very friendly nature, he was desirous to arrange, at this time, this vexatious subject of difference. He was, I am confident, equally determined not to go beyond the estimate laid before Parliament, and he is entitled to the credit of having at once offered the sum he meant to adhere to. Had he not gone to France the very day he sent me his informal proposal, the business would have been arranged six weeks ago.

I have said that he had avoided a discussion on the question of the place where the ratifications should be exchanged. He, however, told me, after the agreement was made, that he admitted fully what I had stated to Mr. Addington, that the convention could not be laid before Congress until ratified by both parties. This, I presume, was said designedly, as, from the view entertained of the subject here, such a course would appear extremely objectionable in reference to this Government. I presume that such information may, nevertheless, be given to Congress of the great probability of a compromise taking place as may justify an act providing for that contingency, and investing the President with the necessary powers, so that the new commission may at once be organized, and proceed to the adjustment of the claims. Although I have no authority for it, it is very evident that the proceedings in the case of the slave trade convention are the cause of London being selected for the place where to exchange the ratifications. And I think I may state with tolerable correctness the view which is taken here of that subject. No fault is found with the decision of the Senate in this or any other similar case. This is considered as a natural and occasionally unavoidable consequence of the political institutions of the United States. It is expected that each branch of Government must and will exercise its discretion on all subjects which by the Constitution are made to depend on its decision. But this circumstance produces this effect, that the power of giving instructions, in fact of carrying on negotiations, and that of ratifying, not being placed in the same hands, the ratification ceases to be a matter of course, but is a substantial act quite distinct from that of concluding and signing; whilst in Great Britain both powers belonging to the same person or body, there is always a moral certainty that a treaty concluded will be ratified. The exceptions, at least, are extremely rare, arising from a departure from the instructions, or from some important unforeseen event, and always requiring a solemn explanation. It is on * * * that difference, as I understand, that is founded the argument that, in order to place in their respective negotiations both countries on an equal footing, it is necessary that the ratification of the United States should precede that of Great Britain; the first being necessarily always uncertain, whilst that of England may almost always be considered as certain. I have the honor to be, respectfully, sir, your most obedient servant,

ALBERT GALLATIN.

Hon. HENRY CLAY, Secretary of State, Washington.

P. S.—By designating this letter "confidential" it is not intended that it should not remain on the files of the Department of State, but only to suggest that, on account of some of its details, it is not at this time altogether fit for publication. I will write another letter in transmitting the convention.

A. G.

Mr. Gallatin to Mr. Clay.

No. 23.] LONDON, November 13, 1826.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit a new convention, concluded this day with the British plenipotentiaries, by which Great Britain agrees to pay and the United States agree to accept the sum of $1,204,960 in lieu of and satisfaction for the indemnity due on account of slaves and other private property carried away in contravention of the first article of the treaty of Ghent.

In my first conferences with Mr. Canning, and in my note to him of the 6th of September, I had only insisted, according to my instructions, on a faithful execution of the convention of St. Petersburg. By my note of the 16th of the same month I acceded to the suggestion contained in his of the 9th, to postpone the discussion of that subject. This I was induced to do, both on account of his intended journey to Paris and because he appeared disposed to offer a compromise.

The basis of that now agreed upon is, that the choice of the arbitrator's decision on all the questions on which the Commissioners may differ being considered as equal, the claim for interest, and all those of a doubtful nature, should be reduced to one-half. There was, as might have been expected, a difference in our estimates of doubtful claims ; and the sum finally agreed upon is that, adding thereto two years' half interest, which was stated in the instructions to my predecessor, to which I was referred, as the least which the United States would accept.

The principal, as estimated by the instructions, was.....	$886,000
Twelve years' interest from the 1st May, 1815, the day from which it was agreed that it should commence, would, at six per cent., have amounted to $637,920—one-half of which, according to the instructions and to the basis of the compromise, is.....	318,960
	1,204,960

This sum is made payable in two equal instalments, the dates of which are such as to make both, as nearly as we could estimate, equivalent to a payment of the whole on the 1st of May, 1827.

The estimate of $886,000 principal was, as you know, made on the best data in the possession of the American Commissioner under the St. Petersburg convention. It is possible that there may be claims admissible beyond that amount. But, on the other hand, that estimate includes a sum of near $150,000 on account of slaves carried away from Dauphin island, which was disputed, on which a reference had already been asked, and the decision on which was therefore doubtful. Upon the whole, I believe that, although the sum payable by Great Britain under this new convention falls short, principally as relates to interest, of what was due in justice to the claimants, yet it is more than all that could have been received under the convention of St. Petersburg, even supposing the right of asking for a reference in cases where the Commissioners differed, to have been allowed in all cases and to its fullest extent.

The British plenipotentiaries objected to stipulations which might be construed as making them parties to the manner in which the claims might hereafter be adjusted or paid; and they rejected altogether the clause, which I was instructed to propose, respecting the apportionment of the money in case it should either exceed or fall short of the whole amount of claims finally allowed. The other provisions suggested by the instructions have, however, been substantially made part of the convention by preserving so much of the St. Petersburg convention as related to them.

The average value of slaves, as fixed by the Board appointed under the last mentioned convention, is made absolute by virtue of the second article of this convention, which also confirms the definitive list of claims, leaving no question open, in that respect, but that of the claims not included in that list on account of omissions in the Department of State, on which particular question the Commissioners had not made an ultimate decision.

The words in the first article which declare that the sum agreed upon is paid and received "for the use of the persons entitled to indemnification and compensation by virtue of the decision of the Emperor of Russia and of the convention of St. Petersburg," will serve as a rule to govern the proceedings of the new American commission which may be appointed for the final adjustment of the claims.

The last paragraph of the fourth article, which provides that "the British Government shall have no further concern or liability with respect to the adjustment of the claims and to the distribution of the money," was inserted at the request of the British plenipotentiaries, in order to remove every doubt in that respect, and particularly to prevent the possibility of an appeal to Great Britain, as party to the convention, by any claimant who might complain that the final decision in his case was not in conformity with the stipulations of the convention.

It has been agreed that the ratifications should be exchanged in London. To this I objected, on the ground of the delay it might produce. But I could not object on principle, the right to select the place being equal on both sides, and the exchange having heretofore generally taken place at Washington, which was also specially designated in the St. Petersburg convention. The anticipated payment of the first instalment is, in the meanwhile, a pledge, if any was wanted, that the convention will certainly be ratified by Great Britain.

I have the honor to be, respectfully, sir, your most obedient and very humble servant,

ALBERT GALLATIN.

SIR: I had the honor to receive yesterday your letter of the 21st ultimo, in answer to mine of 13th September, and authorizing the acceptance of Mr. Canning's offer of £250,000 in lieu of the indemnity due on account of slaves and other private property carried away in contravention of the treaty of Ghent. Although it was hardly possible to have received an answer within a shorter time, the convention, as you know, was already signed when it reached me. Convention with Great Britain.

Difficulties having arisen in the execution of the convention concluded at St. Petersburg on the twelfth day of July, 1822, under the mediation of his Majesty the Emperor of all the Russias, between the United States of America and Great Britain, for the purpose of carrying into effect the decision of his Imperial Majesty upon the differences which had arisen between the said United States and Great Britain on the true construction and meaning of the first article of the treaty of peace and amity concluded at Ghent on the twenty-fourth day of December, 1814, the said United States and his Britannic Majesty, being equally desirous to obviate such difficulties, have respectively named plenipotentiaries to treat and agree respecting the same, that is to say:

The President of the United States of America has appointed Albert Gallatin their Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary to his Britannic Majesty, and his Majesty the King of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland the Right Honorable William Huskisson, a member of his said Majesty's most honorable Privy Council, a member of Parliament, President of the Committee of Privy Council for Affairs of Trade and Foreign Plantations, and Treasurer of his said Majesty's Navy, and Henry Unwin Addington, Esq., late his Majesty's Chargé d'Affaires to the United States of America, who, after having communicated to each other their respective full powers, found to be in due and proper form, have agreed upon and concluded the following articles:

ART. I. His Majesty the King of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland agrees to pay, and the United States of America agree to receive, for the use of the persons entitled to indemnification and compensation, by virtue of the said decision and convention, the sum of twelve hundred and four thousand nine hundred and sixty dollars, current money of the United States, in lieu of and in full and complete satisfaction for all sums claimed or claimable from Great Britain, by any person or persons whatsoever, under the said decision and convention.
